Liner Olympic Gives Work To 350 Wreckers

Town Of Jarrow To Be Provided With £100,000 In Wages Over 15 Months Period

Between 300 and 400 unemployed men in Jarrow are to find work in breaking up the Olympic, 47,000-ton Cunard-White Star liner, and the tenth largest boat in the world. It is estimated that this distressed town in Durham will be provided with work to the value of £100,000 in wages over a period of 12 to 15 months, according to the Christian Science Monitor.

Sir John Jarvis, former High Sheriff of Surrey, is responsible for this transaction. Sir John bought the Olympic for £100,000 and immediately resold it to a Sheffield machinery and steel-works firm on condition that it should be taken to Jarrow to be broken up.

Jarrow 'Adopted'

This is one of the biggest ship-breakings jobs that has ever been undertaken in this country. The River Tyne is being dredged to enable the liner to get alongside the town wharves.

A year ago Sir John, when High Sheriff of Surrey, undertook to "adopt" the town of Jarrow—described as "the worst hit town in the country," where three out of every four men were unemployed—on behalf of Surrey, in order to help to lift it out of its deplorable position.

Sir John immediately commenced work by moving 500 people from rat-infested hovels into 100 respectable cottages in another part of Jarrow, where they paid exactly the same rent.

Building New Industries

Te encouraged them to decorate their own homes. The people of Surrey provided money for purchase of materials. He initiated schemes for laying out a public park, a sports-ground, a children's playground and a swimming bath. Opportunities were provided for the growing of foodstuffs in gardens and allotments and a factory for manufacturing furniture was started.

But Sir John meant to go much further than this. He said at the time: "Jarrow will have to rebuild its fortunes on the basis of new industry—furniture-making, glass bottle and ship-breaking." He sent young men to other parts of the country to learn trades, and a short time ago he bought a small ship to be broken up at Jarrow as an experiment.

Encouraged by the success of this experiment he has now bought the Olympic, and has thus set in motion the wheels of a ship-breaking industry in Jarrow.

EXPLANATION OF TODAY'S CARTOON

The Stilled Honeymoon Express

Seventeen years ago, Mr. and Mrs. A. B. Porter were married, and as the happy bride and groom of only a few hours started on their honeymoon, Mr. Porter took the baggage to the car in the side driveway of their home. Mrs. Porter, on entering the car, found him dead. So great was her sorrow that she has never allowed a person to touch or move the auto, and to this day it still stands in the driveway of the Lakeshore Drive home, Evanston, Ill., where Mrs. Porter left it, enclosed by a fence to insure the carrying out of the widow's wishes.

Freeing Ethiopian Slaves Proves Mammoth Task

street, Mihail's hirelings seized Abainich and carried her away in an automobile. No trace of her was to be found and it seemed certain that her slavery had begun.

Foreigner Got Action

The Armenian protested to the antislavery bureau in the capital and described the whole case to the judge. Being one of the many Armenians here under French protection, he made full use of that fact and threatened to bring the affair to the attention of the French press unless Abainich was found and released. Ethiopia is very sensitive to charges regarding the existence of slavery here, and the stealing of this girl was especially flagrant, since she had complete right, according to the law, to be free and the man who claimed her had a European education.

So the anti-slavery bureau used far more haste and vigor than is customary in this country and Abainich was soon found. She was placed in the custody of the antislavery judge himself, who kept her in his house and she was helped from a fund maintained by the Emperor for slaves seeking freedom. Her case dragged on for more than six months, for the man who claimed her did everything possible to win his case at court. Especially he brought pressure to bear on the girl's mother so as to make her tell the judge that Abainich's father was a slave, which would deprive the girl of the right to be free. The ignorant and defenseless mother was completely in his power, but refused to yield. She was subjected to privation, starvation, chains and torture, but defiantly told her owner that whatever he did she would testify that her daughter had a right to freedom.

And she stuck to that decision. Mihail, in spite of all his wiles, could get the case deferred no longer, and the court unanimously declared the girl free. It went further even and announced that if the young man dared molest her further, he would be severely punished as a slave dealer.

With great joy Abainich returned to the family of the Armenian, in whose office I found her some two years later. She is still careful never to go onto the street alone.

"And where is your heroic mother?" I asked, after I had heard her story.

Waletu's voice was full of sorrow as she said: "She is in my new name. When the court pronounced me free, I received another name. I chose it myself. And I picked Waletu, not because of its sound, but because it means 'suffering for another.'"

OPENS BOOK SHOP

Miss Miriam Phelps, the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. W. S. Phelps, recent residents of Tokyo, has opened an interesting book shop, "Tory Row," at 44 Brattle Street, Cambridge, Mass.

Miss Phelps after her graduation from college spent some years in Tokyo, and was known for her literary ability. Her new enterprise in partnership with Miss Agnes C. Foote is in keeping with her taste and scholarly accomplishments.

The reason why the new book shop has been called "Tory Row" is given in the leaflet which announces the new place of business, as follows:

"Brattle Street has behind it a long tradition of stately homes with shaded lawns and well-stocked libraries, residences of people who loved good literature and established ways. Partriots of Revolutionary times dubbed it "Tory Row."

"In opening the Tory Row Bookshop we offer the booklovers of Cambridge a place where browsing quietly over the shelves or seated comfortably by the fireside, they may become familiar with the books which are now being offered to them by the various publishers.

"Our books include new fiction, biography, history, art reprints of older volumes, books for boys and girls approved by educators, and other more specialized subjects. Mr. Bose is the Indian revolutionary leader who came to Japan as a political refugee in 1915, was ordered deported by the then Japanese cabinet at the request of the British Government, and then kept concealed in Tokyo for eight years by Mr. Mitsuru Toyama, the veteran nationalist leader of Japan, the late Premier Bokudo Inukai, the late Communications Miniser Tokonami and other Japanese leaders.

The memorial services were conducted by the Rev. Mr. C. Iwai, chief Abbot of the temple, and more than 500 persons, including Diet members participated.

World Zionists Have Big Plan For Palestine

year, the highest figure not alone in Palestine history, but comparable perhaps with the peak during the highest tide of Jewish immigration to any country; with conditions for the Jews said to be becoming increasingly worse throughout the world and their degradation in Germany becoming a matter of world concern, with no haven in sight but Palestine—the Zionist movemen entered at this Congress on a phase which holds out fair chance of a partial solution of the Jewish problem.

The new executive, reinforced by sections of the movement which had withheld their co-operation, and with Dr. Weizmann back at the helm, has problems in Palestine itself which are perhaps inescapable for a heterogeneous people finding its feet on new and untried soil. Chief of the evils the executive has to face and subdue is the problem of speculation in land and general profiteering, apparently inevitable in time of economic boom, but which must be suppressed if the idea basic to Zionism—social justice and national righteousness—are not to be overwhelmed.

Haiti Goes Ahead Under Self-Rule

Republic Builds On Foundation Laid By American Marines In Long Occupancy

August 15 was a notable day in Haitian history. On that date one year ago the last of the United States marines sailed away after military occupancy of the Afro-Latin republic for nineteen years, says an article by Mr. Harwood Hull for the New York Times which follows:

On the same date 115 years ago King Christophe, most picturesque as well as the most despotic of Haitian chieftains, was stricken while alone at mass at his chapel at Limonade.

King Christophe left as his greatest monument the Citadel, incomplete at his death after fourteen years of feverish building, an impregnable stronghold which still stands as a marvel of engineering skill and a monument to human energy. The American Marines left behind as their monument the foundation for a new Haiti—a Haiti financially restored, sovereign and sanitary.

The passing of the first unsupervised year may well mark the beginning of a new era for Haiti. Certain it is that at its close, to a greater degree than at any time in the past half-century, Haiti is standing on her own feet. It has not all been clear sailing, nor is there only fair weather ahead.

A Year's Events

President Stenio Vincent briefly outlined what, in his judgment, had been the outstanding events of the year. He listed them in the following order:

(1) Final departure of the marines;

(2) Conclusion of a new commercial treaty with the United States.

(3) Renewal of a treaty with France which insures the continuance of a market for Haitian coffee, the country's leading crop.

(4) Purchase of the Banque Nationale de la Republique d'Haiti from the National City Bank of New York, a transaction only recently concluded.

There might be listed also President Vincent's visit at the White House and President Roosevelt's return call at Cap Haitian in July, 1934, for that exchange of visits paved the way for what was to follow.

President Vincent made no reference to the plebiscite of last February, reportedly the first of its kind ever held in the republic, when, by an overwhelming vote, approval was given to his bank-purchase plan. This involved the unseating of a majority of the country's Senators opposed to the banking project and the naming of others who voted for it. Nor did he refer to the fact that in June, by another election, the term of the President was extended for a five-year period from next May, with one more year for Senators—a procedure involving a constitutional change.

But, after declaring, "We have done our best with our modest resources," President Vincent admitted, with a shy smile, that Haiti has some politicians who are dissatisfied. His statement was a left-handed compliment to the Opposition.

Conditions in 1915

To appreciate the Haiti of today one must have known the Haiti of twenty years or more ago—the Haiti to which the marines went in July, 1915, and before.

For more than a century Haiti has been an independent republic with freedom won from France. But by 1915 this Black Republic, despite many past glories, with its mixture of French culture and tribal customs, its Paris sophistication and jungle simplicity, had become nationally impotent and internationally almost an outcast. President followed President in rapid succession, elected by bullets. The treasury was constantly empty. Debts were repudiated until the country no longer could either borrow or pay. Then President Guillaume Sam was butchered and his mutilated body was carried through the streets. Haiti was helpless but not hopeless when President Wilson stepped in with the marines to lend a hand.

Port au Prince today is spick-and span. Her public buildings glister and every morning her streets are carefully cleaned. Thoroughfares are no longer used for garbage or gutters for sewage. It is as healthy a capital city as can be found in the Caribbean. The lessons of simple sanitarion have been learned for all time, leading Haitians maintain.

The government is poor. Out of a total budget of $6,000,000 for a country of 3,000,000 people, President Vincent said, $2,000,000 went last year for debt service. Government revenue is derived chiefly from taxes on imports and exports. The peasants live almost wholly on what the country produces, and may actually see little money during a period of years. Enough cash for calico and other cloth may be all the money required.

There is a very definite elite class, found in government service and the professions mostly, a cultured group educated in France—men and women of great charm. They are the high-hats of Haiti. Today, while they are no more humble than before the marine occupation, they are giving some thought to the country as a whole.

More attention is being paid to education. Some of the undertakings started by American experts and technicians have been abandoned, others modified, now that Haiti has made a new start. But it was the exaggeration of some of these educational plans and policies, devised by civilians, which caused the greatest antagonism during the marine regime.

Emphasis Shifted

Much of lasting benefit, however, was accomplished, and it would be wholly wrong to suggest that the educational efforts of the past two decades had been abandoned. Rather these has been a shifting of strees.

President Vincent points to a continuance of road maintenance and construction as merely part of the routine administrative accomplishments of the year. Irrigation, better agricultural methods and crop diversification receive governmental support and encouragement. Some rather large-scale undertakings, which will provide both increased employment and ultimate revenue as they succeed, are well under way. Sisal is becoming an important crop, the project stimulated, financed and managed by Americans; already it is in the productive stage.

During the year Haiti has made her bid as a banana producer. An exclusive contract has been entered into between the government and a fruit company of New Orleans for the exploitation of the banana industry. Several thousand stems of bananas are now being shipped weekly.

"BELIEVE IT OR NOT"---by Ripley

EXPLANATION OF TODAY'S CARTOON

The Widow's Pensioner

On the 4th of March, 1831, Benjamin Gannett of Sharon, Mass., became the recipient of a most unusual pension from the Government—a pension for his wife's service in the Revolutionary Army.

Deborah Sampson, Mrs. Gannett's maiden name, enlisted in the army April 1781, and was honorably discharged in November 1783 having successfully masqueraded as a yourhful soldier, under the assumed name of Robert Shurtleff. Then shortly after mustering out of the service, she was married to Benjamin Gannett, with whom she lived until her death in 1827. Thereafter the widow applied for and was granted the pension for her service in the army.

Jury Note

A Union Pacific shopman had been drawn on a federal grand jury, and didn't want to serve. When his name was called, he asked Judge Pollock to excuse him. "We are very busy at the shops," said he, "and I ought to be there."

"So you are one of those men who think the Union Pacific couldn't get along without you," remarked the judge.

"No, Your Honor," said the shopman. "I know it could get along without me, but I don't want it to find out."

"Excused," said the judge.—Topaka Capital.

Nanking Currency Plan From Legal Standpoint

case of liabilities expressed in taels (which is really a quantity of silver) there exists according to the relative silver contents a certain rate of conversion into Chinese currency, (approximately 72 taels equivalent to 100 Chinese silver dollars) which has become customary so that the nominal amount due may be easily ascertained. There may be, however, difficulties where the money equivalent of a certain quantity of silver not expressed in taels or a quantity of silver itself is due. In this case there is no "nominal amount due" but it would appear that the amount due is to be ascertained by applying at any time the Chinese official purchase price for silver. Therefore any future alterations in this purchase price would affect these liabilities.

Alternative Clauses

In case of alternative currency clauses, where one of the alternatively due obligations is Chinese currency expressed in terms of silver (example: x U.S. Dollars, or y £ Sterling, or z Taels at the option of the creditor) the Government decree can only have the effect of invalidating the terms of silver but would certainly not deprive the creditor of his option to demand payment in x U.S. Dollars or y £ Sterling. Similarly gold clauses are unaffected by the Government measures.

Chinese law like other laws is in principle based on Nominalism which means that the law declines to admit a claim on account of the fall in the value of a unit of currency occurring in the interval between a certain transaction and the date when a sum due under this transaction becomes payable.

If a debtor of a money obligation expressed in terms of silver was in default before the coming into force of the decree, the invalidation of the terms of silver by itself cannot give rise to a claim for damages. A creditor in order to be successful must prove that actual damage has accrued, e.g. by the impossibility to pay his own foreign liabilities at a more favorable rate of exchange. An interesting question is whether in case of contracts left executory at the time of the coming into force of the Government measures or in case of instalment contracts a party can refuse to perform his part of the contract because the other party is by operation of law prevented to pay in terms of silver. It is a problematical question and one of far reaching importance whether the prohibition to pay in terms of silver is an "impossibility of performance" in the meaning of Chapter 266, Chinese Civil Code, and operating as a discharge from the further liabilities of a contract and giving also a right to demand a return of what has been performed. Apart from this question of impossibility of performance there may be in special cases also general grounds for a termination of a contract where by the Government decree the whole commercial basis of a contract is seriously affected. These questions may under ordinary circumstances not become practical so long as the silver purchase price fixed by the Chinese Government remains on the old level. In case of silver barter contracts or long term of instalment contracts the situation may, however, be different.

As Affecting Foreigners

Extraterritorial nationals are not affected by the Chinese Government measures except to the extent that the measures relating strictly to currency as the constitution of the new legal tender would be applied by the extraterritorial Courts whenever a liability is expressed in Chinese currency. As extraterritorial nationals will not be able to enforce against Chinese or non-extraterritorial nationals silver terms, they will absolutely cease to contract in terms of silver.

It may be here of interest to describe that exact extent of the British Regulations dated November 4, 1935, and made in connection with the Chineee measures. These regulations are prohibiting shortly any British subject, firm or corporation resident or carrying on business within the territorial limits of China as defined by these regulations to make payment in silver. It is to be noted that only payment in silver (coin or commodity) is prohibited, whereas, according to the restrictive interpretation to be applied to these regulations money payments in legal tender but dependent upon a silver value clause are permissible. This limitation may become material if the Chinese Government for the purpose of increasing the collections of silver would enhance its purchase price or if the money value of the commodity silver is not to be ascertained according to the price availing in China, but is to be fixed according to foreign rates, e.g. those availing in London. Again a British subject is not prohibited to demand silver from any other extraterritorial national subject, of course, to the laws administered by the debtor's Court.

Basis of Conversion

The important American Real Estate and Public Utility Companies which are carrying on business in China have to a great extent liabilities expressed in terms of silver. These silver clauses are legally not affected by the Chinese legislation. On the other hand, they are to receive Chinese paper money from their customers. The practical solution lies for the time being and so far as silver value clauses are concerned in the fact that the official Chinese silver price is kept at the old level. This solution will, however, not be of avail where these silver liabilities are to be performed outside of China, so that a foreign and higher price of silver may form the basis of conversion. In so far as quantities of silver are due, as also in the case of taels, it would seem that the U.S.A. would have to follow, if possible, the British example of special legislation.

SACRED MUSIC

A rare opportunity for those interested in Sacred Music will be offered this weekend in the Kwansai district during the three day sessions of the Bishops' Commission on Church Music of the Nippon Seikokwai. The Seikokwai dioceses of Kyoto, Osaka and Kobe are co-operating in a series of services to be held in the Chapel of St. Agnes' School, Kyoto, this morning at 10; a Choral Evensong at 7:30 tonight in Christ Church, Osaka in which the choir will be composed of all the singers of the Osaka churches and the choir of the Bishop Poole High School for Girls. Sunday the public service will be a sung Evensong at 7:30 in the evening at St. Peter's Church, Kobe and the final service will come on Monday at 7 a.m. a sung Eucharist in St. Michael's Church, Kobe.

The Bishops' Commission on Church Music was appointed last year to study ways and means for the improvement of the choral services of the churches and how to adapt the various services sung in Plainsong and Harmony to not only the churches in the large cities but to the small town and rural churches and missions. The weekend meetings will bring together the various specialists on Seikokwai music from all parts of Japan for a discussion of their work after their first year of study. The first sessions of the Commission will be held today at the Bishop Poole High School for Girls in Osaka and the final day's discussion will be held at the Bishop of Kobe's house on Monday. The members of the Commission meeting in the Kwansai cities are Mr. Karl E. Branstad of St. Paul's University, Chairman of the Commission, the Rev. Fr. J. T. Sakurai, S.S.J.E., Chairman of the sub-committee on Plainsong, and the Rev. Taminosuke Nuki, all representing the Diocese of North Tokyo; Miss Dorothy Hittle of Sendai, representing the Diocese of Tohoku; the Rev. Fr. Nosse, rector of Sanko Church, Shiba and the Rev. P. Y. Banno, secretary to the Bishop of Tokyo, representing the Diocese of Tokyo; the Rev. Eric Allen, Kobe, Chairman of the sub-committee on Harmony, representing the Diocese of Kobe; Mr. Masami Sobagaki and Miss Elsie Baker of Osaka, representing the Diocese of Osaka; Mrs. H. G. Watts of Niigata, representing the Diocese of Mid-Japan and Miss Margaret Paine of Obama, representing the Diocese of Kyoto.

During the first formal meetings of the Commission in Tokyo last year, a choir festival was held for two days at the Chapel of St. Paul's University in which all choirs in the Kwansai district participated. This year the special choral services are centered in the Kwansai district where the commission is meeting. The purpose of festival services is threefold. It is an attempt to encourage the appropriate rendering of the choral worship of the Church and to make it better known to the members of the churches in Japan. Probably many people who listen to well trained choirs think that the effect is due to singers with special endowment. This is not true entirely. The average group is quite capable, with proper training and application, of producing a reverent and beautiful choral service if it chooses music of a simple nature. The music of the church offers many mansions, from simple Plainsong to the elaborate structure of Beethoven's Solemn Mass, and any group of singers, large or small, of little ability or extreme superiority, can find some corner to occupy.

It is the hope of the Commission that singers who take part in these yearly festivals to be held in the various parts of the country will return to their churches and carry with them the inspiration to make their own worship more beautiful. Music if reverently and humbly practiced has its power over the hearts and souls of men. The Church has always realized this and has used it where it has been wise, and neglected it sometimes to its loss. The Church Triumphant, when it has sought for imagery, has described itself as a mighty singing army overcoming with its song the forces of darkness and evil.

Egypt Places Tana Dam On Its New Budget

modern times. It will be retained as a historic monument, all sluice gates have been removed, and used as a roadway for light traffic, the report declares.

Assuan for Power

It is now proposed to build a plant for the generation of electrical power from the Assuan Dam, and the use of the power for the production of fertilizer. The report states that this project has been in mind for 20 years and that now, for the first time, definite steps have been taken toward carrying it out.

"In May, 1935, it was decided that detailed negotiations should be inaugurated in the first place with a powerful United Kingdom group," the report declares. "Should these negotiations fail, the proposal will, it is understood, be taken up with a mixed United Kingdom and U.S.A. group, and, should no success be attained with them, a German group will be considered."

The report shows that the economic recovery of Egypt has been steady and progressive. The foundation of this recovery, it is said, reposed on the record cotton crop in 1933-34. This crop produced a record export over 1,200,000 bales, sold at prices averaging seven per cent more than those ruling in the previous year. Total Egyptian trade, the report shows, increased by £6,000,000 over the trade of the previous 12 months.

British Jew Is Arrested Under Reich Racial Law

The first foreign citizen to be arrested in Germany under the Nuremberg racial law is Rudolf Selz, 58 years old, a naturalized British Jew. He was seized there on Oct. 19 by secret political police on a charge of "racial pollution."

Mr. Selz is a mechanical engineer who was born in Germany but became a British subject twenty-five years ago and fought with the British Army against Germany in the World War, says the New York Times.

The British Embassy was preparing to dispute the case vigorously on the ground that it involves discrimination between two allegedly different types of British subjects. British officials do not recognize the right of any country to make such differentations.

World's Greatest Water Project In Deep Africa

3,000 Arabs Building Dam To Hold 2,500,000,000 Cubic M. Of Waters

Deep in the African desert—1800 miles from the gardens and domes of Cairo—the second link in the world's greatest irrigation project is now under way, says the Cairo correspondent of the Christian Science Monitor.

Huge derricks rise above the flat horizon bearing tons of stone. Locomotives send black smoke against the ever-blue sky. And with their heads bound up against the sun in dirty, white turbans, or shaded by cork helmets, 3000 Arabs mold into a single five-mile barrier the strategic units of a dam which, by 1937, will hold 2,500,000,000 cubic meters of Nile water and play a major part in transforming the ancient land of the Pharaohs into the garden paradise of all Africa.

It is appropriate that the world's most ancient civilization should be engaged in history's greatest program for irrigation. Egypt has always lived from the Nile waters. Her pyramids, libraries and engineering feats were as much a product of intelligent utilization of the great river as were the grains that fed her millions of people. Dikes and levees were devised to salvage the Nile's precious annual waste, and canals and "lifts," operated by bullocks, camels and even manpower, conveyed it to areas higher than the Nile's level. And only after these annual flood waters had soaked deeply into the soil were they turned back into the river channel and given to the sea.

Times of Famine

Out where the Ethiopian rain had ceased and the Nile ran low, and sometimes dry, between January and October no further crops could be cultivated. Thus resulted the great granaries and storehouses, and the famines that decimated the people even in spite of them.

Not until the middle of the past century, of Mohammed Ali, was perennial cultivation of the Nile Delta conceived and executed.

The first of Mohammed Ali's projects, the Detla Barrage was undertaken by him with the definite object of making the cotton grow there year round. He had introduced cotton into Egypt and wanted it to prosper. He completed the Detla Barrage in 1890, and it not only successfully held the Nile surplus during November, December and January but raised the water level to such a height that it could be served to the Delta lands by canal during the succeeding months, when the Nile itself was entirely dried up. The Barrage held water enough, even, to irrigate the Delta lands until the beginning of the next flood.

First Major Link

The Asyut Barrage, designed to store up water for the provinces immediately south of Cairo, was the next to be built; and it was finished in 1902, simultaneously with the great Assuan Dam, still farther south, and the first major link in Egypt's plan to control the entire Nile system. The first heightening of the Assuan Dam, 1907-1912, was contemporary with the construction of Esna Barrage, which furnished flood irrigation to the province of Quena.

And following these projects were the second heightening of the Assuan Dam by an international committee of engineers, 1927-1933; the building of the Nag-Hamadi Barrage between Esna and Asyut Barrages; the erection of 12 electric pumping stations to lift water for the irrigation of some 50,0000 feddans of (the feddan euals 1.04) high level land in Assuan province; the construction of 17 electric drainage stations to drain 1,000,0000 feddans of low land bordering the lakes in the Nile delta, where the finest cotton is produced; the building of the great Sennar Dam on the Blue Nile to open up the Gezira—a huge area between the Blue Nile and White Nile—to cotton cultivation; and several subsidiary works connected with the remodeling of existing canals and drains in order to make them capable of dealing with the tremendous volume of extra water.

The White Nile floods in October, whereas the Blue Nile floods in August and September. The Blue Nile contributes more water to the main stream during comparative flood seasons, sending down volumes calculated at Khartoum at 57000 feet per second, only 10 per cent less than that of Nigara River, as compared with 1400 cubic meters per second for the White Nile; but after the flood season is over—long after the rains have ceased in the Ethiopian highlands—the White Nile continues to supply 82 per cent of the total water going to Egypt. Even in April it sends down 540 cubic feet per second, as compared with the 120 cubic feet per second discharged by the Blue Nile in April.

Striking Contrasts, Old And The New, Feature Mexico

Radio Blares In House While Farmer Turns Sod In Field With Ancient Plow

In no other country in the world does one see the striking contrast of Mexico; the old and the new side by side. The beautiful new "School of the Revolution" (Centro Escolar Revolution), the last word in modern architecture, is right around the corner from some of the oldest, most crooked little streets in the country where one may find houses that date back more than a century, says an article in the Christian Science Monitor.

Quaint colonial churches will flourishing modern factory and often, at night, one can hear the blaring tones of a radio emanating from a seventeenth century convent which has been made into an apartment house.

In the country, this contrast is even more intensified, sometimes to the point of ridicule. It is no strange occurrence to see the dancers at a native festival dressed in the plumes and robes of their Aztec ancestors beneath of which protrude an unexpected pair of American tennis shoes.

Long Way Yet to Go

Education has made wide progress in the past two decades but the task ahead is still formidable.

In all villages of Mexico, old women are highly respected for their wisdom and common sense. Sometimes their fame spreads to nearby villages and people come from far and near to ask their advice on every imaginable subject, from the care of children to the sowing of crops. The Mexican's superstition has not been exaggerated in the many books written about him in recent years.

The Indian, in some respects, is amazingly quick to grasp certain factors of the white man's civilization, but in other ways he stubbornly refuses to depart from the customs of his forefathers.

Plow as in Day of Cortez

The contrast between the two civilizations is seen in the villages where a group will be gathered around the town's one radio while in the nearby fields, peasants laboriously turn up the earth with the ancient and troublesome plow of pre-conquest days.

Indian women, even those who work in Mexico City, still wash clothes according to the complicated ritual bequeathed to them from centuries, perhaps thousands of years, past. On the first day the clothes are soaked, on the second they are rubbed with soap and placed in the sun, on the fourth they are washed, on the fifth dried and finally after one week's waiting, the patient housewife receives her clothes ironed.

It is useless, as many Americans have found out, to say that there are quicker and more efficient ways of washing clothes.

Good for Aztecs, Good for Us

The general attitude seems to be that what was good enough for the Aztecs should surely suffice even for an American accustomed to washing machines.

This reluctance to part with old customs is one of the most difficult things for a foreigner to comprehend about Mexico. Take the siesta" as an example. The "siesta" was invented paticularly for hot countries where the fierce noonday sun made it inadvisable to venture out of one's house between the hours of one and four.

Mexico City is by no means hot, but on the contrary has an even, often chilly, temperature due to its high altitude.

It's the Custom

There is no logical reason for a "siesta," yet promptly at one every store closes up tightly, the employees go home for the midday meal and then at 4 may be found sipping coffee at a nearby cafe. If one inquires why the "siesta" exists, here the answer will be, with the shrug of the shoulders, "Es el costumbre." (It's the custom).

And so this vast country moves on, with modern factories manned by natives in hand-woven sandals and sarapes, with women washing clothes in a stream which runs beside a powerful railway, and native festivals conducted to the accompaniment of an American radio. The old world and the new, inexorably interwoven, producing a series of contrasts that are like the bright flashing colors of the countryside

Drank 90 Glasses of Beer a Day

On display in an honored position at Mutt and Jeff's Beer Garden in Richmond Hill, New York, is the mug from which George Rudroff (Mutt of the firm) drank 90 glasses of beer each day for 8 solid years. Before prohibition, Mr. Rudroff tested beer in New York breweries and every day for the entire 8 years he was so employed, he consumed 30 pitchers of beer, equalling 90 glasses—a total of 224,640 glasses, or 1,560 half barrels of beer—all from the same mug.

The Strange Story of Will Adams (Miura Anjin), The Contemporary of Shakespeare, Who Won The Confidence of Tokugawa Iyeyasu

By JAMES A. B. SCHERER

Author of "Japan's Advance," "The Romance of Japan," etc.

Tomb of Will Adams and His Wife.

Dr. Scherer's presentation of "Miura Anjin" as a Japanese samurai is thrilling, and his portraiture of that bygone time has the ring of truth. His romance is real history, and I find it far superior to any historical novel of recent years. For he knows the Old Japan at first hand, and has absorbed its atmosphere. He is as much at home on the straw-mats of Nihon as in the Mermaid Tavern: and he transports his reader with him.'—Dr. Thomas Baty in The Japan Times.

FUKYU FUKUIN KYOKWAI

In connection with the 50th anniversary of the German and Swiss Protestant Mission in Japan which has just been observed the Rev. E. Hessell has written the following historical account of the mission:

In September 1885 the first Protestant missionary of the European Continental churches to Japan, coming from Germany, but of Swiss nationality, the Rev. Dr. Wilfried Spinner landed in Yokohama and started the work of the "Ostasienmission" (OAM) formerly called "Allegemeiner Evangelisch Protestantischer Missionsverein" (A.E.P.M.).

The work was handicapped by many financial difficulties during the Great war and the following years of depression but in recent years it has developed very well and there has been built a small Japanese Church which is called "Fukyu Fukuin Kyokwai." Under the management of this Church the following activities are carried on:

23 Churches and preaching places
17 Sunday schools
6 Kindergartens
2 Student Homes
2 Nightschools
1 Theological seminary

The attendants of services and Sunday Schools number about 3000 weekly; the entire number of people reached during the last year is estimated between 60,000 and 80,000.

In Celebration of the 50th anniversary of this work the Fukyu Fukuin Kyokwai held special meetings at Tokyo, Kyoto, Toyohashi, Osaka and Kobe and many other places in the beginning of November 1935 and expressed their thanks for the Services done by these German and Swiss Missionaries. Especially mentioned were Dr. Spinner, Dr. Schmiedel, Dr Munzinger, Dr. Wendt, Dr. Christieb, Dr Haas, Dr. Schiller. Prominent speakers on this occasion were former students and Pastors of this Church, Prof. Dr. Ebina, Prof. Hiroi, Prof. Dr. Ishibashi, Procurator Furuya a.o.

The Church has now its own self-administrative committee to which belong P. Akashi, P. Suzuki Taichiro and P. Haggi.

Representative of the Mission in Japan is Rev. Hessel at Kyoto, Zwinglihouse. The Homeboard of the Mission is at Berlin (Dr. Devarianne) and at Zuerich (Dr. Pfister). Besides the work in Japan, medical and schoolwork are carried on in China (Prov. Shantung).

Sterilization Of Unfit Favored By Noted Physician

Lord Dawson Of Penn Speaks On Medical Science And Social Progress

Lord Dawson of Penn, noted English scientist and Physician, spoke in favor of sterilization of the unfit in a recent address before the York Medical Society, on "Medical Science and Social Progress."

He said that as society had developed, the sway of natural selection had lessened, according to the Times, London Today the progress of medical science, the qualities of justice and mercy, and the organized efforts of the community were bringing it to naught. And so the "unfit" were preserved. Nature's method of securing quality of population involved a high death-rate, as well as a high birthrate. In this way there was a wide, though rough, selection. If they displaced nature's method of a high death-rate they must secure quality of population in another way. They heard much of economic "planning" in order to secure the greater welfare of the people. What would this avail unless they gave a like attention to "planning" for a healthy race?

Civilization, having in large measure nullified nature's method of eliminating the unfit, needed to replace those methods by social determination—by control of environment and inheritance:—(1) Methods of future to build up fit citizens, having regard to their biological capacities, and (2) means whereby the "unfit" could prevent damage to the community by their production of bad stock and bad homes. For the promotion of fitness during school age, two measures in particular stood forth—efficient nutrition and physical education without prejudice, but rather basic, to training of character and mind. Nutrition was now receiving earnest attention. A missionary campaign throughout the length and breadth of the land to teach housewives the values of essential foodstuffs and not less important knowledge of their purchase and cooking would be a vast power for good.

The right nourishment of the young body was of such moment that the assumption by the State of an adjunctive responsibility for the feeding of children became justified. It was so important to secure increased consumption of milk, dairy produce, and vegetables that sound planning envisaged not only control of prices, but, in the cases of children and expectant and nursing mothers, the subsidizing of the consumer by grants of milk, free or at low cost.

Physical education should be a prominent, if not the first, item in any school curriculum. Further, to youth, unemployment did serious damage to quality—especially of mind and character. If, with the specialization of industry, some measure of unemployment was likely to be a lasting feature of the modern State, could not the unemployment allowances granted to the young be compulsorily linked up with such institutional provision as would provide occupation and training of body and mind?

Turning to measures of prevention, Lord Dawson said that sterilization would be a form of preventive treatment in the interests of the race. It was a branch of therapy comparable to preventive inoculation. Lord Dawson went on to consider the mechanism of inheritance, and showed how hereditary bodily or mental defects, like deformed fingers, certain forms of blindness, of deafness, of chorea, and of epilepsy and mental deficiency could be so transmitted that the individual (1) was not only personally defective but would be very prone to transmit mental defect to succeeding generations, or (2) would not be personally defective but would be a carrier of mental defect, which would remain submerged in the strain until there was future matching with a like carrier—when a full-blown mentally deficient descendant would appear. There was no means of detecting carriers, who were many times more numerous than actual defectives, and no thinking person supposed that sterilization would touch this part of the problem. It was not, however, an unreasonable hope that some day means for detecting "carriers" might be discovered. On the other hand, actual mental defectives were a demonstrable danger, and especially the milder forms which were able to live in the community. Not only were they unfit to rear children, but if they did perpetuate their strain more mental deficients would be the result.

Sterilization was a restraint on freedom to procreate, but the law restrained liberty in matters of communal health, and when parents were ignorantly obstructive public medical services could act forcefully in the interests of children. By similar reasoning, why should not future generation be protected? This led to the question of cooperation between legal and medical procedures. In recurring delinquency, especially if entangled with mental defectiveness, sterilization would be a protective measure comparable to a sentence of "preventive detention," but with the advantage that when out of prison propagation by these undesirables would not take place.

The practice of sterilization was not new: it was rather that this country lagged behind. It had been in use in Switzerland for nearly 50 other States for a long period. It years, and in California and certain was now recognized in Denmark, Sweden, Norway, Finland, and Germany as a means of preventing hereditary physical and mental defects from damaging the stock and doing injustice to future generations.

Australian Prime Minister Asks Hughes To Resign

Lyons Says Minister Of Health Challenges Sincerity Of Govt. Sanctions Bill

The two most sensational events of the year in Australia occurred on November 2.

Mr. Lyons, the Prime Minister, asked for the resignation of Mr. William Morris Hughes, Minister of Health and war-time Prime Minister: and Peter Pan, "the wonder horse," was beaten for the first time and not even placed on Flemington race-course, thus upsetting the whole betting card for the Melbourne Cup. Peter Pan finished lame, and may not be started, in which case the bookmakers will benefit by a quarter of a million pounds.

It was by telegram late the previous night that Mr. Lyons requested Mr. Hughes's resignation, on the ground that the views expressed by him on sanctions in his new book, "Australia and War," were diametrically opposed to the views of the Government and afforded ammunition to the Opposition for the debate on the Sanctions Bill which began on October 31, says The Observer, London.

Mr. Lyons's message says, inter alia, the book "challenges the wisdom and sincerity of the Government's Sanctions Bill, strikes at the root of our support of the League, and the loyal discharge of covenant obligations, and attacks sanctions as being either a futile or a warlike gesture."

The book states that sanctions must ultimately rest on force. If Great Britain uses her force to carry them out, war results; the League having no force, cannot carry out its decisions, which therefore are futile gestures, for the rule of law must always rest on force.

Mr. Hughe's argument really is that a strong man armed is a much more effective person than a weak man with a mouthful of beautiful phrases.

Though he has been dumb as an oyster during the debates on sanctions, Mr. Hughes has voted always with the Government, but he is known to consider the British Government's policy extremely dangerous and liable to result in war.

But his book says nothing more than his previous writings, particularly "The Splendid Adventure," published in 1929, wherein he foresaw the present trouble and emphasized that Dominion membership of the League creates a dual loyalty—to the Empire and to the League—which eventually must clash. Of the two he prefers the Empire.

Mr. Hughes's attitude to the Government is that Australia is already committed and is wholeheartedly behind the Government, but this should not prevent people from being warned, as he has already warned the Government in Cabinet, what the outcome may be.

His views that sanctions mean war are similar to those expressed in a memorandum by the new Federal Chief Justice, Sir John Latham, a fortnight ago.

Mr. Hughes will have the sympathy of the bulk of Australians, most of whom do not care a button about Ethiopia, to whose admission to the League, Australia's representative, Sir Joseph Cook, objected. Others regard the League anyhow as an expensive futility, while all object to war being risked unless vital Imperial interests are jeopardized.

Mr. Hughes's Reply

In an interview with the "Argus," at Melbourne the some day Mr. Hughes says that he is wholeheartedly behind the sanctions legislation.

"The suggestion," he said, "that I am opposed to them is ridiculous and unwarranted by anything in my book. I merely point out the necessity to support sanctions adequately, some of them requiring force to make them effective."

Women's Club Gets Inside Slant On The Motion Picture Business

An inside slant on the motion picture business was gleaned by members of the Tokyo Women's club during a visit to the P.C.L. studios Monday afternoon

Mr. Okawa

Guided by one of the actors, Mr. Heihachiro Okawa, the members walked through one of the "streets" of the production set and watched the taking of a scene for the forthcoming movie, "Uwasa No Onna" the Hollywood name for which might be, "The Woman Talked About."

For this shot, a middle aged man sat in the center of his wine shop and spoke a few lines. The picture was taken between rings of a bell and at the end of each shooting, workers sang out. "Okay!" and the picture was retaken—up to seven times. The first "takes" were test shots, the guide explained. The actor spoke in a low voice, the microphone over his head taking the words through a heavily coiled wire to the sound department where it was to be amplified and later synchronized to the picture.

The "street" through which the women walked inside the concrete building was warmed and lighted by numerous powerful spotlights. One side were sets waiting for action—a barber shop complete to the loungers, a geisha house, a tea house, a post office and a waiting house.

Watching the construction of sets, the club members were surprised to find that interiors of houses were made by pasting old newspapers over a rude lattice work. The "elegant" note was achieved by varnishing over the newspapers. The guide explained that the company used newspapers to cut costs of production.

When one of the members asked if the P.C.L. studio was the largest in Japan and another asked if it was the best, Mr. Okawa replied negatively to each question and then added, "It is the cleanest." In the last three years, he continued, the company has made 25 pictures.

Next object in the tour was the storehouse where members saw various light fixtures, flower arrangement vases and baskets, paper lanterns, geta, and a few costumes jammed into shelves. Dressing rooms were also viewed and one actor was seen being helped into his trappings by anederly maid. Conspicuous by their absence were actresses.

Concensus of opinion was, after walking along the sawdust strewn street, seeing the newspaper-walled houses and the painstaking methods of production, that the motion picture industry is hardly glamorous from inside.

At the close of the inspection, the club was shown two shorts, "Present Day Japan" and "The Four Seasons in Japan."

Both shorts moved quickly, the former opening with a view of "Peerless Mt. Fuji" and including shots of men and women pouring out of Tokyo station at the beginning of the business day, Tokyo's office buildings, its factories, and beautiful views along the moat.

At the next meeting of the club, December 8, Mr. John Struthers will speak on "Scots in North Europe—Intercourse in Bygone days." The library will be open before and after that meeting but will be closed this Thursday, Thanksgiving day.

Indian Province Plans Means To Aid Ryots

desirable creditor than the sowcar, is there a real transformation in his financial position? I believe there can be no doubt about the answer. The old debt was a permanent and increasingly heavy millstone round the neck of the unfortunate khedut which, in many cases, killed all live interest in his work.

The new debt is, on the average, but a fourth of the old one; its repayment within a reasonable time is more than a practical possibility. And, provided the light interest charge be paid, it does not grow. The results in the case of khatadars in those areas first dealt with are, it is reported, already manifest, both in the greater heart the cultivator is putting into his work and in improved recoveries of land revenue.

Village Councils

It is not to be supposed that the heart of the sowcar has changed or the khedut grown out of his traditional improvidence in a day. Is there any good reason to expect that the next serious failure of the monsoon will not start the whole sad business over again? I think there are reasons. Sir Prahbashankar Pattani builds great hopes upon another experiment, an attempt to revive certain features of the ancient system of administration of the internal affairs of a village by a panchayat or village council. The view is taken that, by allowing and encouraging the village to manage its own affairs, the seeds of self-reliance and cooperation will be sown.

US Meat Packets Look For Good Year In 1936

brought us to the present level of prices, and with the correction of these causes under way it seems improbable that we shall see higher prices."

Outlook for 1936

Somewhat rosier was the review of conditions made by C. A. Burmeister, senior agricultural economist in the U. S. Department of Agriculture.

"Summarizing the situation as I picture it," he said, "meat production in 1936 terms of dressed weight will not be greatly different from that in 1935. The quality of the supply, however, will be much improved. The livestock industry throughout the country will enter the coming winter in much better condition than it did last. . . .The physical condition of livestock generally is probably better than average and consumer demand for meats, expressed in terms of the ability of consumers to buy, is somewhat stronger than that of a year earlier and considerably stronger than two years ago.

"The necessity of forced liquidation of livestock because of food shortage or other unfavorable conditions is no longer evident. Instead, there is a strong demand for stock for replacement purposes in those sections where forced selling was necessary last year, and a general feeling of optimism prevails throughout the industry."

Smokers Warned Of Stomach Ulcers

Before Breakfast Cigarette Is Held By Researchers To Be Particularly Bad

Smoking before breakfast is one of the quickest ways to risk ulcer of the stomach, the American College of Surgeons was informed recently in San Francisco, Cal., in the findings of one of the most extensive investigations ever made of this common affliction.

One gets ulcers primarily because one has a weakness for them; there is no generally effective medicine to prevent or cure them, the report said. One must make a lifelong change in habits, particularly in ways of eating, drinking and smoking, it was added.

The ulcer study was made at Tulane University by Aton Ochsner, Professor and Director of Surgery, assisted by Dr. Mims Gage, and Dr. Kiyoshi Hosoi. Dr. Ochsner reported the results of five years' investigation, says the New York Times.

The ulcers occur on the "lesser curvature" of the stomach, the name for the roof of that portion of the stomach which is curved somewhat like a fish hook. The weakness for them consists in "tissue susceptibility," and "constitutional predisposition." The latter appears due to certain arrangements of the networks of nerves and of small veins of the stomach.

Too much acidity, the Tulane physicians reported, is almost certainly one of the general causes of ulcers when it occurs in stomachs with these peculiarities.

Care about eating and drinking habits, they held, is the only safe way to avoid this danger line of acidity. Taking alkaline drinks, the report said, has little effect.

Acidity can be reduced effectively by more frequent meals. The report recommended small meals every two hours, except during sleep, in place of the standard "three squares."

Most important of all are the eating, drinking and smoking habits.

"Excessive use of tobacco," the report stated, "especially between meals on an empty stomach is dangerous. Very bad is smoking in the morning before breakfast."

Alcohol, condiments and excessive use of meat were listed as dietary temptations needing special caution, but the report declared the stomach ulcer diet should not be too rigid.

"If roughage, condiments and excessive meat are avoided, said the report, "almost everything else can be taken successfully. But don't overload the stomach. Calcium carbonate is better than sodium bicarbonate. Alkalines are probably of less significance than formerly considered."

Other causes of ulcer among those with the predisposition are too much secretion of the digestive fluids, injury, and infections.

Conscience Urged As Guide

The surgeon's conscience, rather than his scalpel, should be his first consideration in dealing with his patients, Dr. Robert B. Greenough of Boston, retiring president of the American College of Surgeons, said in his presidential address at the first general gathering of the clinical congress of the college. More than 2,000 fellows of the college were in San Francisco.

"The science and art of medicine are of necessity so little understood to entrust their lives and their welfare to the physician rather upon faith in his character and reputation than upon actual experience of his abilities." Dr. Greenough said. "Thus conscience becomes one of the most important elements in the character of the physician."

"The physician or surgeon likewise should have all due consideration for the financial status of his patient," Dr. Greenough said. "The patient should be advised against obtaining special consultants, procedures or nursing care merely because of fear of the outcome, as, in many cases, they merely represent service luxuries.

"On the other hand, the financially restricted patient must be assured that his lack does not cut him off from the most skillful medical or surgical attention, and must be directed to the sources of this skilled attention whenever available."

Personal Relation Urged

"We must start with the definite understanding that physicians and surgeons are no born as supermen; they merely have to become so," Dr. Greenough added. "They are influenced by the same considerations of ambition, selfishness, greed and jealousy as afflict other human beings.

"From the beginning of the medical school course, however, and especially in the last two years, when the student comes more in contact with clinical work in the hospitals, he begins to appreciate the peculiar relation of personal responsibility to his patient, which the physician must be ready to accept as the first and foremost condition of the practice of his profession.

"Shall the surgeon permit himself to be made the mechanical assistant of the attending physician? Not at all. The full responsibility passes at once to the surgeon when he accepts the patient. He must convince himself that the circumstances warrant the operation, that all reasonable méthods to confirm the diagnosis have been made; that there are not sufficiently important contra-indications to prevent the operation, and that it is in the best interest of the patient that the operation be performed.

Fee Question Discussed

"The subject of surgical fees is again a question in which the conscience of the surgeon must play an important part. It is a well-established axiom that maximum fees for surgical service can be paid only by the very well-to-do and that the greater part of the surgeon's work must be performed either gratuitously as is customary in free hospitals and clinics, and too frequently also in private practice, or at fees far below the maximum amount accepted in the community in question as reasonable and proper remuneration for the service rendered.

"It is usually only when the patient is for some reason dissatisfied with the service given, or when he comes to the conclusion that the fee charged is exorbitant that complaint is made. These difficulties can be avoided to a great extent if financial considerations are discussed beforehand, but there seems to be an almost unaccountable reluctance to adopt this plan.

"Since there is always of necessity some discussion as to hospital accommodations, however, the subject of expense of surgical services can readily be brought into consideration. From this point of view it is the patient's financial welfare, rather than that of the surgeon which is under discussion, and mention of surgical fees beforehand is not likely to be misconstrued."

Rare Costumes Will Be Modelled At K.B.S. Meeting This Evening

Rare and beautiful Japanese costumes will be modelled and a history of Japanese costumes will be given at the final meeting of seminar third of the Kokusai Bunka Shinkokai at the Peers club auditorium at 8 p.m. today.

Mr. Tsutomu Ema, president of the Society for the Study of Japanese Manners and Costumes, will be the speaker. A large attendance is expected. Invitations for the meeting have been issued by Viscount Nagakage Okabe, acting chairman of the Board of the directors of the Kokusai Bunka Shinkokai.

During a talk on the history of the economic development of Japan delivered before the second seminar of the association Tuesday evening at the Peers club auditorium, an interesting account of the early monetary system was given.

Assistant Professor Takao Tsuchiya of the Tokyo Imperial University recalled that coins were used as early as the Nara era but did not become common until the Tokugawa period. Early in that period, gold, silver, cooper, brass, and iron were used in exchange. The silver was weighed each time it was given as payment. The iron and brass coins were by hand. There was no standard system of coinage. Each town or city had its own money. Late in the period, money became fairly common in the villages.

Paper money also became common during the Tokugawa era, the clans and the cities issuing their own paper money. Prior to the restoration, the Shogans also used paper money.

With the early effort to regulate money, the credit system was established. Hoarding of money brought into being the exchange broker. Buying gold and silver, he became the first banker and soon was accepting money for "saving" or, as it later was known, for deposit. Such individual bankers were found in old Yedo and Osaka.

As money interests gained prestige over land interests, the samurai were started on their well known decline.

Prof. Tsuchiya remarked that at the height of the feudal period, there was about one samurai for every 15 or 16 members of the country's population.

Inner Mongolia Troubles Center About Prince Shih

The league and banner system resulted from this policy of the Ching authorities. Thus the hereditary banner chieftains were appointed, each banner being allotted a fixed district. It was in 1634 that this system was established. The status of a banner chief was made hereditary and each was required to obtain the Emperor's approval for the nomination of his heir, this being done through his league chief and the Lifanyuan, the Central Government Department in charge of the outlying regions. This system has been continued by government after government and is still theoretically in force under Nanking's rule.

Aside from historical tradition, there is no law defining who is empowered to appoint and dismiss banner chiefs. The Mongolian modus operandi already referred to and the act providing for the organization of the Political Committee of Mongolian Autonomy make it clear that the committee is responsible to the Executive Yuan at Nanking. Those holding the Nanking Government responsible for the appointment and dismissal of banner chiefs are prone to fall back upon this provision as the only legal ground for their contention. The committee is not vested with legal power to appoint or dismiss the chieftains. Might seems to be right in this case.

Another complicating factor was the Red menace which threatened Inner Mongolia from across the Shensi border. Alarmed at this situation, the chief of one of the two leagues of Suiyuan has tried to enlist the assistance of the provincial military authorities in order to stave it off, and has asked for a conference with the provincial officials. This cannot fail to attract the attention of the Nanking nominees who are ever eager to snatch at any chance whereby they may extend their influence over the league and banner regions of Inner Mongolia.

It must not be assumed that the movement for "Mongolia for the Mongols" is doomed. On the contrary, the Political Committee of Mongolian Autonomy has suffered little or no loss of prestige. The Mongols are rapidly awakening to the problems with which they are faced, and their aspirations for freedom and independence are daily growing stronger. The recent growth of the Manchu Empire and the Republic of Outer Mongolia, between which Inner Mongolia is situated, leaves no doubt in the minds of these former nomads that they must no longer remain an outlying colonial people subject to the rule of China proper with which they are coming to have less and less in common.

The banner chief issue remains to be settled, and its settlement will, in all probability, serve as an indication of the future possibilities of the Political Committee of Mongolian Autonomy. In this connection, the Mongols observed an important memorial day on October 9, the second anniversary of the movement for self-government in Inner Mongolia, the event being marked by the issuance of a vigorously worded circular telegram announcing the racial agitation for autonomy. The observance of this anniversary, which cannot but stir the political aspirations of the Mongols, will be followed by the third plenum of the Political Committee of Mongolian Autonomy, on the agenda of which stands the banner chief dispute, the Gordian knot for Mongolian leaders. A temporary settlement may be possible by officially approving the recent action of the committee chairman in dismissing the banner chief and at the same time working out a compromise plan to save his face. All in all the committee, beset with many difficulties, still has a long and hard way to go before it attains any semblance of political independence for the seminomad populace of Inner Mongolia.

The Note

The wife of an usher, suddenly remembering that she had left her Sunday roast in the oven, hastily wrote a note to her husband and gave it to another usher to hand to him. He however, mistook it for a note to the minister, who was in the middle of his sermon.

Thinking it was an important announcement, the minister unfolded the note and read aloud: "Please go home and turn off the gas."

Two of a Kind

The visitor claimed to be a good pianist, with unusual ability in reading music at sight. Seeing a sheet of music on the piano rack, she sat down and began playing, pounding the keys with little regard for correctness or time. Observing the small daughter of the household watching her earnestly, the player pressed harder on the loud pedal, lifted her hands higher, and ended the performance with a flourish and a bang on a discord.

Whirling around on the stool, she bestowed a patronizing smile upon the child, who looked up and naively remarked, "I can't play that, either."

SEND GIFTS TO U.S.

An interesting ceremony was held in the playground of Hibiya Park on Tuesday afternoon when a variety of battledores that are being sent to the United States by the Japan Playground Association were on display.

Mr. Kiyoshi Inoshita, superintendent of parks, made a brief address, after which a gay battledore was handed Miss Helen Durgin. She acted as representative of the children in America who are to receive these gifts in time for Christmas.

After the presentation, the girls who attended the function, dressed in their best kimono, played the New Year's game. Mr. Inoshita then invited the playground supervisers and special guests to tea at the Matsumoto restaurant.

This is the third time hagoita have been sent to the United States as Christmas gifts, and the American children are in consequence becoming familiar with this typical Japanese out-door game.

Sent by the Japan Playground Association of Tokyo, the battledore will go to the following centers:

content by denudation of the outer leaves. Pasteurized milk contains, roughly, only two-thirds of its original vitamin content."

Food Schedule Suggested

As a basis framework on which to build a proper diet, Dr. Conn suggested the following daily allowance: one quart of milk supplemented twice a week by cheese; two cups of vegetables, one fresh when possible; one cup of fruit, including citrus fruits or canned tomatoes three days of the week; one cup of whole cooked cereal supplemented two or three days a month by uncooked grain germ, and one medium-sized serving of fish, meat, fowl or eggs, with the addition of liver once each week.

After allowing for any food sensitivities of the individual, he recommended that the remainder of the diet should be made up of bread, potatoes, macaroni, crackers, rice, cakes, sugar, jelly, jam, syrup, cream, butter and salad oils as dictated by the appetite and the necessity of regulating the increase of weight.

There was no excuse for any one not knowing the basic diet requirements, Dr. Conn pointed out, because pamphlets on the subject were to be had from both the Canadian and the United States Governments.

Evidence of Arrested Cancer

Further evidence that cancer is curable if diagnosed and properly treated in its early stages by radium, surgery and X-rays, was presented before the annual community health meeting of the college tonight by Dr. Bowman C. Crowell of Chicago.

The American College of Surgeons, Doctor Crowell stated, had a record of more than 25,000 cases of known cancer that had been treated and the patients had remained well for periods of five to thirty years.

"Many cases of cancer can be prevented, and many more cured," Doctor Crowell said, "if people only will seek the advice of their doctors before they are driven to it by pain. Discomfort or some other symptom, when the disease often is so far advanced as to greatly lessen hope.

"It is really unfortunate that cancerous growths do not cause pain as soon as they start."

Kremlin Opens Party Purges In Wide Area

Higher Officials Assume Openly Right To Decide Admission To Ranks

The Kremlin has ordered a new drive to "purify" Russia's Communist Party, which exercises a monopoly in politics. The recent "cleanings," or periodic examinations, which resulted in the expulsion or degradation of one Communist in four, are condemned as not sufficiently severe, says the Moscow correspondent of the Christian Science Monitor.

Orders are issued for repetition of the "cleanings" in Moldavia, the Azov-Black Sea Region, and Uzbekistan, where there has been much disaffection among cotton growers. Most important of all, a ruling is made that hereafter only the two secretaries of regional party committees can approve applications for admission to the party or transfer of a member from one region to another. This ruling appears to strike a blow at party democracy, placing absolute control over admission of new members in the hands of a few higher party officials.

Democracy Abandoned

This is perhaps the most important change made in the Communist Party for several years. Russia's rulers have not claimed that democracy existed generally under the "proletarian dictatorship." But they have asserted that complete democracy prevailed within the ruling party. Now this claim, or pretense, is abandoned, and a small group of higher officials openly assumes the power to decide the personnel of the party.

The change is justified by the need to eliminate "adventurers" and "rogues" from the party. It is apparent, from the wording of the decree, that these words are used to describe not only corrupt and dishonest persons, but also those who venture to hold opinions not approved by the Kremlin, which they conceal to avoid expulsion.

Because the Communist Party exercises a political monopoly, and because political control in Russia means control of almost every phase of life, ambitious men and women of all types naturally seek membership. The Soviet press, commenting on the recent changes in party organization, explain that clever men of an undesirable type can deceive lower party officials, so it is therefore necessary to permit only higher officials—presumably better judges of character—to pass upon admissions.

At the same time, these higher officials are instructed to scrutinize personally the record of every existing party member, and weed out those who are undesirable. It is explained that these include not only corrupt and incapable persons but also those who are "politically illiterate"—who do not thoroughly comprehend and agree with the Kremlin's views.

The Kremlin conceives of the Communist Party as a hard care of completely dependable persons The periodic "cleanings" are intended to eliminate unceasingly all "unreliable elements" from the party, so that the dictatorship may be certain that it has in the 2,000,000 members of the party a group of thoroughly devoted supporters.

But the "cleanings," thorough as they have been, are now declared not to have been thorough enough. Despite all the care which was taken, not only corrupt persons but persons with independent views have managed to get into the party. Therefore the dictatorship seeks to seal loopholes through which they have entered by entrusting admission only to higher officials whose "dependability" is unquestioned.

Health Is Drunk To New Prince At Pan Pacific Club

Argentine Minister And American Visitor Share Honors At Luncheon

A toast was drunk to the Imperial prince born Thursday at the opening of the Pan Pacific club luncheon Friday noon at the Imperial hotel. Mr. Eduardo Racedo, newly appointed Argentine Minister to Japan, told the club:

"I have read something about Japan and my father has told me about the country, but all that does not compare with what I have seen in reality of the activities of this country since I landed in Kobe, my first port in Japan."

Prince Tokugawa who presided, said in introducing the Argentine minister:

"His Excellency Mr. Eduardo Racedo has been more than 25 years in the diplomatic service, having been posted in Chile, Brazil, Uruguay, Paraguay, Venezuela, the United States, Great Britain, Germany, Switzerland, Austria and Hungary. Japan is the twelfth country in which he has been in an official capacity. He has also served on many occasions in the Ministry of Foreign Affairs in the Argentine. His last post was in Vienna, where he was for three years. He is a son of Marshal General Racedo, who served the Argentine Republic on various occasions as Minister of War and Navy, as well as Governor of the Province of Entrerrios, and took much interest in matters regarding Japan.

"Madame Racedo is the niece of Admiral Domecq Garcia, a great friend of Admiral Togo and Japan, who was in the battle of Tsushima aboard the "Kasuga" as an observer."

The other speaker at the meeting was Dr. D. C. Jackson, professor emeritus and honorary lecturer in electrical engineering at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology who with Mrs. Jackson is on his second visit to Japan.

Mr. Jackson said:

"Japan has nobly come out of its old feudal period and has taken a place among the great scientific and industrial nations of the world. It is one of the three or four great industrial nations now. We scarcely appreciate what it has accomplished. America should have much of sympathy with Japan and much of kindly inter-relations, because we are so similar in many respects as nations. We both are very old in culture. American culture is often said to be young, but it is not.

"Japan is old in agriculture as compared with America, because the Americans had to develop a new Agriculture to suit conditions. In that respect the two nations are different.

"In industry we are both young, Japan somewhat younger than America, but I can see many of the characteristics of scientific study and education in Japan which are quite similar to those I can remember the American nation passing through in my young days. Many things in Japan impress me as being characteristic of what our industries went through, but you have the added good fortune of having the most modern technique. These things all lend a certain amount of similarity to the two nations, so that we ought to have admirable friendship, and I believe that is likely to be realised.

"I think that the Japanese have failed to bring to our attention in America, to the full or even to an adequate decree, the great development of education and liberality of government which you have here. They have brought to our attention their sentimental aspects and their artistic aspects, but the great foundational basis of their education, which indeed is one to be envied, and the development of science and the way in which industries have been developed, have not been laid before the American people in a way they can understand. Very few Americans recognise that literacy in Japan is as high as in the United States. In fact there certain individual states and we have 48 of them in our United States) which actually do not have as high a literacy as Japan, when we consider the principal islands. Very few recognise the high status of education and research in science in Japan.

"I think perhaps Japan is just coming to the edge of creative work and developments that will add to the strengthening of the bonds between the two nations, because we are great students of the psychological aspecs of nations as well as students of science and agriculture and industry. I think it might help if this Club could suggest that the Americans do not know enough of Japan, for the best interests of both nations, from the standpoint of education and science."

Italy Mobilizes Women And Ships

Mothers And Widows To Organize Boycott Against Powers Applying Sanctions

Swiftly following the meat restrictions approved on October 29 in Italy came an announcement the following day that the Fascist party had entrusted to provincial committees composed of mothers and widows of men killed in the World War, the task of making a house-to-house canvass to organize retaliation against League of Nations sanctions.

This means not only that the consumption even of necessities will be cut drastically but that goods produced in countries applying sanctions against Italy will be boycotted altogether, says Arnaldo Cortese in the New York Times. There is already an intense campaign in the press to this effect.

(A census of the Italian merchant marine to determine the strength of the naval reserve and looking toward the arming of merchant ships if necessary was ordered in a decree issued yesterday by Premier Mussolini, according to an Associated Press dispatch from Rome. Belief was expressed that the Premier thus planned to prepare his sea power for a possible war in Europe.)

It is expected that the retaliatory measures which will be undertaken by women will be put into more definite and legal form in a decree which Mussolini is said to be preparing. This apparently will declare an immediate and automatic boycott against goods from countries applying sanctions, and in addition to retaliation is also intended as a warning in a hope that some countries of which Italy is a good customer will reconsider their position.

War Basis Soon Is Seen

Further measures to be undertaken will depend on how serious are the sanctions that Geneva is about to apply. Many think, however, that Italy will soon be put on a war basis as far as foreign trade is concerned.

Under such a system no goods whatever would be allowed to enter the country except those necessary to feed the population and carry on the war in East Africa. The purchase of these goods would be strictly subsidized by the government in order to make sure they were obtained only from countries refusing to adhere to sanctions. The idea is that in this way Italy can do her best to punish the countries she regards as her enemies and reward those she considers to be friends.

Italy purchases from most countries far more than she sells to them, with the result that sanctions will prove to be a two-edged weapon. Italy will suffer by having to do without or endure a scarcity of some things she has hitherto considered necessities, but the countries that formerly sold to her will also suffer by losing a good customer, and most countries refusing to apply sanctions will certainly benefit by the flow of Italian trade directed to them.

This applies, chiefly to Austria Hungary and Germany, which are now regarded by Italy as being the friendly countries.

Anti-French Feeling Grows

Italians are showing growing anger at the attitude assumed by France. This country built its hopes on France, only to see them cast to the ground one by one. Some people are beginning to say they have been betrayed, for they hold that Premier Pierre Laval showed marked sympathy for Italy only for sufficient time to reach a satisfactory agreement with Great Britain and then immediately changed his side.

These sentiments against France were increased today by reports from Paris saying that a very close military understanding between France and Britain had been concluded. In Italian official quarters, although no exact information has yet been received, the general tendency is to cast doubt on these reports or at least to consider them exaggerated.

Nevertheless, the fact cannot be ignored that France is regarded with deep suspicion and is denitely ranked alongside Britain as a sanctionist power—in other words, among Italy's enemies.

This explains why news from Paris that negotiations are going on there with Britain to find an eleventh-hour solution to the Italo-Ethiopian problem is received in Rome with marked lack of enthusiasm.

Dr. Butler Sees Peril Of Anarchy

Receiving Degree At Amherst, He Calls On America To Assume World Leadership

The degree of Doctor of Laws was conferred by the trustees of Amherst College upon Dr. Nicholas Murray Butler, president of Columbia University, and Dr. Laurens H. Seelye, new president of St. Lawrence University, at Amherst, Mass., on November 9.

The special convocation was called as the principal feature of the annual council week-end, and was addressed by Dr. Butler, who asserted that world leadership and the preservation of liberty against the forces of despotism and anarchy rested chiefly in the hands of the English-speaking nations, says the New York Times.

In conferring the degree upon Dr. Butler, president King said:

"President of Columbia University, for a generation you have been the unquestioned leader in the transformation of your alma mater from the small college from which you graduated in 1882 into the metropolitan university of today which serves the civilized world. You have conceived your life in terms of public service, and have become America's most distinguished private citizen working for the public weal.

"Amherst College, proud of the intimate relations which have existed between Columbia and Amherst for sixty years, delights to make you her foster son."

In his address Dr. Butler said in part:

"We are resting today on our intellectual oars, taking for granted the veracity of Magna Charta, the acts of Parliament, the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution. We are now in a period of skepticism, turning through hopelessness to despotism.

"The great war is still going on. It is a mistake to think that hostilities ceased on Nov. 11, 1918, and that the world disarmed at the Treaty of Versailles. Nations have developed instrumentalities of economic warfare which are new working to impoverish the entire civilized world. Our trouble today is international anarchy and economic warfare.

"We are at the parting of the ways. The United States is the greatest creditor nation in the world and the responsibility for world readjustment rests with us. For a great people to turn their backs to world problems is incredible.

"If the American people are to be restored to their former prosperity the economic war must be brought to an end, and in so doing we must play an important part in the drama of world leadership."

Confidence

"Mother, have I been a good boy lately?"

"Yes, Bobby, you have been a very good boy."

"And do you trust me, mother?"

"Why, of course, I trust you, son."

"Then why do you go on hinding the jam?"—Pacific Rural Press.

Those cared for by the Yamaguchi Settlement, for which the Women's Auxiliary of Holy Trinity Church is giving a Silver tea Tuesday, are doing their best to help themselves. Recently they held a rummage sale—garments had been made from rags they had picked up in Tokyo streets and parks and had cleaned—and with the money made, they bought rice to give to those poorer than themselves. The picture above shows the bags of rice just before the poor gave them to the poorer.

The Silver tea and bridge will be held at the home of Mrs. John L. Curtis. A large attendance is expected—and hoped for. Upon the amount of money taken in depend the lives of many children and helpless old people.

600 Telephone Girls Wanted In London Before Next March

Six hundred girls with silvery voices, deft fingers, and quick brains are wanted in London before next March by the G. P. O., who will train them as telephone exchange operators. More girls are also wanted in the provinces.

This is because the telephone habit in Britain has grown to such an extent that recently more than 2,000,000 additional calls per week have had to be handled, as compared with corresponding periods last year, says The Observer, London. Still heavier increases are expected in 1936.

"We are anxious to get girls of secondary school education between sixteen and nineten for the vacancies," an official stated yesterday. "An important point is that girls must be at least five feet high. The reason is that the girls' arms must be able to reach to the various switchboards.

"They will begin at a salary of 29s. a week. At twenty-one years of age each girl receives 46s. a week, which goes up to £3 1s. 6d. per week, with prospects of still further promotion.

"Good voices are, of course, important. Voices should be attractive, but not affected. Oxford accents are certainly not desired. The girls should speak clearly, distinctly, and with 'personality,' if possible.

"The new girls—who will be paid during their period of training—will be interviewed by the chief woman supervisor and given voice tests."

Austrians Split Into Two Units By Geneva Action

the "old" liberal principles of the nineteenth century versus the new idea of the authoritative state.

Friendship with Italy, the speaker claimed, was possible after all the enmity of the war days, only because it was between two completely new States—the new Italy and the new Austria, two corporative States. Austria's present attitude, he added, was dictated by common sense and by gratitude. It was noted, however, that Herr Adam did not recall the financial assistance which the League gave Austria from 1922 onward, when she was on the verge of hand, doing a thriving business in Vienna as broker for Italian purchases of food and war materials from those countries which have refused to apply sanctions, and on the other hand he is said to be equally well aware that the Austrian currency can be maintained at its present level only with the help of Britain. Indeed, Austrian business circles believe that if such help were withdrawn, a second dreaded inflation period would be bound to follow.

The Government's continued pro-Italian policy is causing more and more irritation in the Tyrol and Styria where, after last year's insurrection, order was only restored with great difficulty, and where Italy's inability to give military aid might again lead to a revival of National Socialism. Indeed, it is said to be no secret that the Government has been aware for some time that any Ethiopian success would arouse great jubankruptcy. He also told the nation that all recent talk about dissensions in the Cabinet was completely untrue, although many Austrians remained unconvinced and the feeling persisted that it would have been better if the speech had not been made at all. The subsequent cabinet shifts showed that there had been considerable trouble within the Government.

Meanwhile, the feeling of the Man-in-the-Street is fear of shortage of food. The Italians will buy up everything, he thinks. Already fats are scarce and nothing can make the Viennese more miserable than to be deprived of his rich, fat "Mehlspeisen."

The business man, too, is torn between the prospects of, on the one bilation among the Austrian people, and that the first serious defeat of the Italians might even compel a change of government.

EXPLANATION OF TODAY'S CARTOON

Eternal Footsteps

More than 50 years ago, January 25, 1884, D. P. Erasmus was killed by lightning as he was working on his farm, now known as Hoogekraal, Natal, South Africa. The spot on which he stood when the bolt from the skies took his life, was a slick, clay surface which hardened immediately, and has to this day withstood the ravages of time and climate. The foot prints are still visible, surrounded by a square of stone markers placed there by Mr. Erasmus' son David, a silent tribute to a pioneer toiler of the South African veld.

Prince Kaya's Son Named

The fifth son of T.I.H. Prince and Princess Kaya who was born on November 24 has been named Munenori, the Imperial Household Minister Mr. Kurahei Yuasa announced Saturday.

Their Imperial Highnesses are at present residing at Himeji.

Likee Jokee?

A guest at a banquet took pains to make himself agreeable to a Chinese sitting next to him.

Somewhat at a loss for small talk he ventured, after the first course, to inquire, "Likee soupee?"

There was no reply except a genial beam. After the next course he followed up his first opening with "Likee fishee?" This evoked a still more genial beam.

Later in the evening the visitor from the Far East responded to a toast in perfect English.

On resuming his seat he asked his discomfited neighbor, "Likee speechee?"—El Paso World News.

TOKYO A.D.C. TO PLAY "TEN MINUTE ALIBI"

The Tokyo A. D. C. seems to be striking out on a new line with its Christmas production. There has been much light comedy lately. The club therefore has decided to try an exciting murder story which should appeal to a wide public in these days when detective novels enjoy such a vogue. The original feature of the play selected, "Ten Minute Alibi" by Anthony Armstrong, is that the audience learns who has committed the crime even before the sleuths (played by Messrs. Tabor and Cheke of the British Embassy) appear on the scenes—and the interest arises from the high ingenious manner in which the murderer (Mr. Frank Harris) juggles with time to throw them off the scent.

Love is the motive of this unusual crime. There seems little which can prevent the smooth and sophisticated South American (Mr. H .V. Bleackley) from taking the Girl (Miss Eleanor Child) off to Jaris with him until the young man, who loves her but who has concealed his love until he was financially able to take care of her, presents a few somewhat drastic arguments—including a revolver with a silencer on it—to which the villain is obliged to yield.

These are arguments, however, which are p[illegible] together approved of by the [illegible] and the audiences who will w[illegible]ness the play at the Imperial Ho el Auditorium on 11th and 12th December will be kept in suspense to the last moment wondering whether the young man will 'get away with it". Everyone in the flat at the time of the murder falls under suspicion, and not only the valetbutler (Mr. D. J. Hedley) who has 'done time' at an earlier stage, but the distinguished if choleric Sir Miles Standing (Commander G. C. Ross) and even the Girl herself are given a pretty warm time of it by the sleuths. Much turns on the important evidence given by a Soho restaurant manager (Baron James Baeyens) and the denoument is entirely unexpected.

The club has undertaken a difficult task in presenting this modern piece and much interest is attached to the manner in which the actors play it. Seats may be booked at the Imperial Hotel from December 4.

INTERNATIONAL WOMEN'S CLUB

The first drama meeting of the International Womens' Club of Yokohama will be held on Friday, at 9:15 p.m., instead of December 13 as originally arranged.

Miss Elena Pavlowa, the Russian dancer, will present a program of ballet dancing which will consist of several ballet numbers and solo dances, as well as interpretative Indian ballet. Assisting her will be Miss Nadejda Pavlowa and Mr. Fukazawa Shuka, the ballet master of the Shochiku Theaters, who has composed many popular ballets. Piano accompaniments will be played by Mr. Yokota Takahashi, and for one of the dances there will be a koto player.

The first meeting of the club in charge of the Literature Department will be held on Friday, December 20, at 3:30 p.m. Dr. T. Okada will speak to us on the subject: "Japanese Poetry Making." Dr. Okada was for many years a teacher of English of more than usual distinction. He has travelled extensively both in Europe and America and is familiar with the thought and culture of the western world. He comes to us, therefore, well prepared to interpret this phase of the literature of the land in which are now living. The quaintness and beauty in Japanese poetry we are most of us barred from appreciating because of language difficulties. We are anticipating a glimpse of them by means of Dr. Okada's interpretation. He has done some poetry writing himself both in English and Japanese. The time of the National Poetry Contest is not far and we hope to be able to understand its aims and accomplishments better after we have heard Dr. Okada. We are expecting an interesting and informing lecture.

New members of the Club are:

Mrs. Belsjoe, Miss Mabel Bennett, (Associate Member), Mrs. H. M. Browne, Mrs. Cherskoff, Mrs. R. D. Chevalerie, Mrs. Davies, Mrs. K. Divers, Mrs. Harrison, Miss L. Kivi, (Associate Member), Mrs. J. Women's Club Hears Address On Ancient Scotsmen

Scott Of St. Paul's University To Be Speaker At Next Meeting, Dec. 9

Mr. R. W. Scott of St. Paul's University, will be the speaker at the next meeting of the Tokyo Women's club, Mrs. W. J. Davies, club president, announced at the close of the meeting Monday. He will speak on a topic involving art, history and religion.

The following meeting will be the annual Christmas concert to be held at the Imperial hotel. Guest tickets will be available and those who expect to bring friends should get these tickets as soon as possible.

Emigration of Scotsmen to various parts of Europe was the theme of an address delivered by Mr. John Struthers before the club meeting Monday. He gave an account of the early history of Scotland as a starting point for his lecture. He explained that the early Scotsmen went to other parts of Europe other than in England for it was not until the 17th and 18th centuries that dissension between England and Scotland over border difficulties was stopped.

The earliest travelers from Scotland went abroad as missionaries, Mr. Struthers continued. Scotland and Ireland were both Christian countries in the fifth, sixth and seventh centuries while England was a pagan country, Mr. Struthers said. He spoke of the monasteries which were erected, naming the Monastery of St. James of the Scottish Benedictines at Ratisbon, which survived the Reformation and existed down to -862. At that time it was bought by the Bavarian government and turned into a clerical seminary.

In addition to those who went abroad as missionaries, many left their homes in Scotland to study in continental universities. This early interest in learning is reflected by the early date at which universities were founded in Scotland—St. Andrews in 1411, Glasgow in 1450, and Aberdeen in 1494.

The Reformation changed the streams of student emigration, Protestant students finding Holland and Switzerland giving them their best theological training.

Commerce also lured many Scotsmen abroad. The trading centers included communities in Holland, the Baltic area, Danzig and Poland which was an important commercial center as far as the Scotch were concerned.

Military service drew some abroad, these going chiefly to France. Sweden's king Gustavus Adolphus set up more than 60 Scotsmen as governors of castles and towns in the 17th century.

From 1603 the emigration of Scots to Europe began to decline as the crowns of England and Scotland were united and their parliaments merged in 1707. From the late 17th century, the Scots have contributed to building up the British Empire, Mr. Struthers remarked.

When the Lamas of the Talong Monastery take holy orders their hair is done up into an eternal knot. They take a vow of celibacy and swear never to undo their hair as long as they live. As the hair grows the knot mounts higher and higher.

New River

The New River at Lauderdale, Florida, "shortest, deepest and most beautiful narrow winding river in the United States" was created in a single night, according to an old Seminole tradition which is worthy of belief. The site of the river was formerly a tropical jungle. One dark night the Indians were startled by a thundering noise. Emerging from their huts the following morning they found that a mighty river had burst forth overnight to flow majestically through the jungle. Subterranean rivers have been known to burst to the surface suddenly to assume a surface course henceforth.

Bryn Mawr Fete Marks 50th Year

About 1,000 Delegates From Colleges, Societies Attend Two-Day Celebration

With Elizabethan banners flying from the towers of Rockefeller and Pembroke Halls and animated groups of alumnae reminiscing at Owl Gate and along Senior Row, Bryn Mawr College in November 1 went back through half a century of history to pay tribute to its founders and recall the status of women's education in the Eighties.

The beginnings of Bryn Mawr, described on its opening day as a bequest "to the community at large, which has an interest in its advantages and a right to its benefits," were reviewed by President Marion Edwards Park, according to the New York Times.

She spoke that night in Goodhart Hall at the outset of a two-day fiftieth anniversary celebration in which alumnae and undergraduates were joined by about 1,000 delegates from learned societies, colleges and universities of the East and Middle West, says the story which follows:

Sharing the program with President Park was Cornelia Ottis Skinner† '22, who presented a costume sketch of college days around 1885, written by herself. Preceding the meeting were a dinner given in Rockefeller Hall for the delegates by Dr. Park and one given for the alumnae by President-Emeritus M. Carey Thomas in the Deanery.

Miss Thomas, who has been closely associated with Bryn Mawr throughout its history, first as dean for eight years then as president for thirty, and who now, still vivacious and keen-minded at 78, is writing her autobiography, was regarded everywhere as the central figure of the celebration.

"She is Bryn Mawr," said an officer of the Alumnae Association.

The tributes to her began tonight with President Park's address and will continue tomorrow, when President James B. Conant of Harvard, President Ada L. Comstock of Radcliffe and President Isaiah Bowman of Johns Hopkins speak in the morning at the chief formal meeting of the celebration.

In the afternoon a $5,000 prize award named for Miss Thomas, and given at intervals to women for eminent achievement, will be presented to Dr. Florence R. Sabin of the Rockefeller Institute for Medical Research.

Tribute to Quaker Founder

President Park, in her historical sketch, discussed the "patient work, the preparation" which preceded the opening of the college on Oct. 23, 1885. Referring to Dr. Joseph W. Taylor, a New Jersey Quaker whose million-dollar estate gave Bryn Mawr its start, she said:

"Bryn Mawr has always felt keenly its rights and responsibilities as a college for women, and it is perhaps salutary for us to recall that not a woman, but a man, was its founder. That he was of Quaker stock, by inheritance then concerned with education and accepting serenely the equality of men and women, makes his gift to us of a plan and a fortune less surprising."

Miss Park said that as the idea of founding a college grew on Dr. Taylor he sought advice from President Daniel Colt Gilman of the newly established Johns Hopkins University, who "apparently suggested that the new college be an annex to Johns Hopkins."

Failing to convince him, Dr. Gilman sent his friend on a round of visits to women's colleges. Miss Park quoted the late President Laurenus C. Sellye of Smith College as saying that he "attempted delicately to suggest" to Dr. Taylor that "an existing institution might be strengthened rather than a new women's college established."

"But both presidents rallied and gallantly wrote letters of advice and suggestion to their determined visitor," President Park went on. "President Sellye's is far-seeing and practical.

"Perhaps the most significant sentences in Dr. Gilman's letter advise the founder of a new college for women to follow the choice made by Johns Hopkins in the controversy between required and elective systems of study—just initiated by Eliot at Harvard—and at the opening of Bryn Mawr eight years later was announced the adaptation made by the dean of the college of the three-year John Hopkins undergraduate course based on 'groups of studies' to a four-year 'group system' at Bryn Mawr."

Relating that Dr. Taylor in 1877 drew his will leaving most of his estate for a college to extend "to women the opportunities for a college education which are so freely offered to young men," Miss Park said that "having drawn the will and finding himself still alive and competent, he went on to carry out its provisions himself."

First President and Dean

Eventually, during his rides west of Philadelphia he found, bought and started construction of two buildings on "a high and healthy tract, on the line of the Pennsylvania Railroad and near enough to Haverford College to admit the possibility of cooperation in the use of gas and water or even in library and teaching."

Leaders in carrying on the projected plan for the college after Dr. Taylor's death in 1880 were Dr. James E. Rhoads, the first president, and Miss Thomas, the first dean, both elected at the same meeting of the trustees.

On Miss Thomas's return from Europe, where she had studied at Lepzig, Zurich and Paris and won her doctor's degree with highest honors at Zurich in 1882, Miss Park said, "a happy fate befell Bryn Mawr College—and we may say the young scholar herself—in their almost instant connection."

"Beautiful, vivid, dynamic, fresh from prolonged academic training in European universities as well as in an American college, she was ready to organize and administer the projected program," Miss Park added.

Miss Skinner's monologue, "A Campus Idyll," in which she appeared in a bustled plaid dress of the Eighties, described herself as worried lest the "loud" dress would "clash with the scholarly atmosphere."

She recalled the era when young women began to harbor doubts of how "Jonah could have lived so long in the whale," when they began to hunt frogs and earthworms for biology, refused to think it a sacrilege to study Greek and began swimming in natatoriums and doing calisthenics in blouse and Turkish trousers at Bryn Mawr, the "seminary of culture."

A series of tableaux which followed her monologue reproduced old pictures of college activities and were posed by undergraduates in costume.

The first was the singing of Bryn Mawrensium, the class song of 1889. A tableau of the 1897 basketball team showed costumes in which long skirts almost concealed the althetes' modest gaiters.

Irish Parliament Changes Likely

Bicameral Legislature May Be Introduced; Abolition Of Senate Determined

The session of the Free State Parliament which opened on Oct. 30 may witness some revolutionary changes in the system of government that has obtained for the last thirteen years. One of these is the probable substitution of a unicameral for a bi-cameral legislature.

The abolition of the Senate already has been determined. The Bill to accomplish this was passed by the Dail nearly two years ago, but as the Senate refused to assist in its own execution and rejected the measure, its coming into operation was delayed for a period of eighteen months.

According to the constitution as it stands, the Senate has not the power to destroy legislation, but only to delay. The period of delay has now almost elapsed and after November 25 the Government may, if they so desire, send the Bill again to the Senate and, even if that body refuses again to pass it, it becomes law after the lapse of sixty days. Should the Senate reverse its previous attitude and accept the Bill now, it is possible that it may be disbanded before the end of the present year.

Another measure which it is understood the Government propose to put through in the coming session is a Constitution Amendment Bill, the effect of which would be to remove the name of the King and the Governor-General from all connection with the government of the country. Mr. de Valera indicated his intentions with regard to the Governor-General when he stated in the Dail some months ago that he hoped he would not again have to move a vote for the upkeep of the Governor-General's establishment.

De Valera's Free Hand

When these chagnes have been made, and particularly when the Second Chamber has been removed, the part in power, so long as it maintains its majority, will exercise complete dictatorial authority. In the case of the present Government this would mean the virtual concentration of all power in the hands of one man, for it is well known that Mr. de Valera for all practical purposes is the Fianna Fail party.

The opening of the new session of the Dail will see some alteration on the Front Opposition bench. Mr. Frank MacDermot, who, when the House rose, was Mr. Cosgrave's deputy-leader, has separated from the party and will now sit on the Independent benches. The Cosgrave party still keep membership of the Commonwealth and a settlement by negotiation of the dispute with Britain as the main planks of their program.

200 Families Sent By U.S., Alaska Pioneers

Fifty to seventy-five trout is not an uncommon catch. A co-operative cannery is planned to take care of the salmon run, but meantime the provident tent-holder may salt or can sufficient fish for his winter stock, as well as supply his present needs.

Two hundred acres roughly are planted to community gardens—potatoes, rutabagas, radishes, lettuce, peas, grain, strawberries and so on. These are distributed through the commissary as they mature, or will be put up for winter use. Colonists, in a word, who complain of the high cost of living—even in terms of credit—have failed to make the best of the natural wealth of the country.

This is to be expected when it is realized that only a small proportion of the colonists are bonafide farmers. Although their contracts with the corporation state definitely that they have come to Matanuska to farm, many have other plans. Carpenters, cabinetmakers, tool and die makers, school teachers, machinists and truck drivers have joined the colony in the expectation of working at their trades.

Sickness has taken its toll in the valley. The colonists brought measles with them from the States. Mothers with babies less than two weeks old were permitted to make the arduous journey by train and boat. False reports have gone out that the colonists are without doctor or nurse. In reality the situation is better than it is in many a community at home, within three hours of a first-class hospital in Anchorage. Trains run daily, and airplane service is available in case of emergency.

Rapid Population Growth

On its face it would seem that medical service is adequate. Nevertheless, many of the colonists are anxious and dissatisfied with it. What the sponsors of the project seemingly overlooked when choosing vigorous young women of child-bearing age were the babies that would arrive. Estimates of expectant mothers run from fifty to more than a hundred.

Fear psychology is playing its part—fear of new conditions, fear of an unfamiliar climate. Yet the climate of the Matanuska Valley is less severe than that of the Northern States from which the colonists have come. Chiefly it is the fear of the unknown which must have attacked every adventurer into new regions.

Quinton Stow who arrived in Adelaide in October, 1837, as a missionary from the Colonial Home Mission Society, London. With his wife and family he lived in a large tent for three months, and this was used as a place of worship on Sundays, packing cases serving as pews.

One of the most interesting centenary features will be the Boy Scouts corroboree to be held in the Adelaide hills at the end of the Jubilee year. Invitations have been issued to Boy Scouts in many parts of the world and following the great success of the Melbourne centenary jamboree, the corroboree is expected to attract many visitors. The national park commissioners have granted extensive grounds in the hills for conducting the carnival. At least 4000 Scouts are likely to take part.

Marine Drive Begun

Work has already begun on the marine drive from the Outer Harbor, where the overseas liners berth, to Largs Bay. The drive will cost £25,000 for the five miles and will be completed within three or four months. It will be a memorial to the state centenary.

Special attention will be devoted to the employment of youths next year and a big conference is likely to be held to discuss ways and means. Representatives of Victoria, New South Wales, Queensland and Western Australia will be invited to attend and all the employment councils, committees and organizations will co-ordinate in a big effort to relieve unemployment of youths between 15 to 21.

New Hindu Temple To Surpass Taj Mahal

A new Hindu temple, higher than the famous Taj Mahal and the historic Tanjore temple in southern India, is to be built at holy Benares, the focal point of the Hindu faith. It will be 220 feet high, estimated to cost $750,000 and dedicated to the god Shiva.

The temple is being designed at the suggestion of Pandit Mokan Malavlya, the venerable Indian statesman who wishes it to be expressive of present day Hindu idealism, according to the New York Herald Tribune. Sri Chandra Chatterjee, a distinguished Indian architect, has been intrusted with the design. It is reported that Harvey Wily Corbett, American skyscraper expert, will be invited to study the design and give suggestions.

French Budget Plan Opposed In Paris Chamber

Laval Says Franc Must Be Devaluated Or Deflated: No Third Method

After attending a long Cabinet meeting on November 12 M. Laval, Prime Minister of France, and M. Regnier, the Minister of Finance, met the Finance Committee of the Chamber later the same day.

M. Laval made another general statement on the budgetary problem and reminded the Committee that he had been given a mandate to save the franc. M. Regnier submitted figures proving that the Budget amendments proposed by most of the Committee would upset the Government's program, and were, therefore, unacceptable, according to the Times London.

M. Laval emphasized that, in rejecting the Government's deflationary Budget, the Committee was running the risk of unleashing the forces of inflation. The first to suffer from that would be the small rentiers, old-age pensioners, ex-Service men, and salary-earners generally—just the people the Committee wanted to help. They had to choose between devaluation and deflation, and those who said that there was a third way out of the wood were, in his view, demagogues whose promises bore no relation to facts.

He went on to explain that he was willing to consider all suggestions, but the Budget had to be balanced. He had no objection to modifying certain of his cuts in the interests of the small man. He wanted the Committee to understand that he was prepared to do all he could to remove legitimate grievances, but it had to be understood that if it was proposed to increase expenditure increased revenue would have to be provided. Yet now was hardly the time to increase taxes. The country was groaning under the weight of its present burden.

Devaluation Urged

M. Paul Reynaud, one of the Paris Deputies, asked M. Laval if he did not think that devaluation would provide them with a solution to their present difficulties. It would enable them to pursue a policy of expansion and to enjoy the benefits of a trade revival. M. Reynaud regretted the present official campaign against devaluation, because it meant that an orderly depreciation of the currency on the Belgian pattern was practically excluded unless they did it at once.

M. Laval replied that even to discuss devaluation was dangerous. Whenever the question was raised it led to shipments of gold, a weakening in the price of Rentes, and a fall in the franc exchange. He added that he remained unalterably opposed to devaluation in any form. He appealed to the Committee to give the Government's policy a chance. And to those who praised the results of the British experiment he would say that it had been in operation only for four years and they would have to wait longer before drawing final conclusions.

M. Regnier's figures proved that the amendments proposed by the Committee would mean an addition of about 2,500,000,000f. (about £33,000,000) to the Budget.

He said that the tax increases recommended by the Committee would not yield more than 85,000,000f. Moreover, the creation of a pensions fund on the lines proposed would compel the Treasury to borrow about 885,000,000f. during the current year. That would mean a further strain on the French capital market. They were going to borrow between 6,000,000,000f. and 7,000,000,000f. in 1936 on account of extraordinary expenditure. Railways would require between 4,00,000,000f. and 5,000,000,600f. If another 1,000,000,000f. odd were added, that would bring their total borrowings up to 13,000,000,000f., without allowing for any unexpected items. The Minister added that he was prepared to reconsider any anomalies, but the principle of a balanced Budget must be maintained.

It was agreed to set up a sub-committee to study the effects of the Budget amendments. This sub-committee will get in touch at once with the appropriate officials at the Ministry of Finance, and will submit a full report to the Committee before it reconsiders the part of the Budget which M. Laval and M. Regnier defended today.

The members of the Committee hope that the Government will agree to modify the cuts in the incomes of rentiers at a cost of 150,000,000f. instead of 500,000,000f., as first proposed by the Committee. They also hope that the salary cut imposed on fonctionaires will be modified at a cost of 250,000,000f. instead of 960,000,000f., as first proposed, and that some of the pension cuts will be restored at a cost of 125,000,000f. instead of the original 1,097,000,000f. This would make it necessary to find only between 500,000,000f. and 600,000,000f. in revenue. The final vote on these proposals will be taken on Thursday.

M. Herriot presided over a meeting of the Executive Committee of the Socialist-Radical Party this evening. A unanimous resolution was passed, suggesting a compromise between the Government and the Finance Committee of the Chamber.

BUSHIDO
(112–16)
The Soul of Japan
By Dr. INAZO NITOBE
TOKYO EDITION
5"×8" 250 pp. Bound in Beautiful Cloth
Price ¥2.00 Postage 8 sen
"Bushido" is the Japanese feudal equivalent of chivalry. Literally it may be translated "Military Knights' Ways," or "Precepts of Knighthood." It embodies the maxims of educational training brought to bear on the Samurai, or warrior class of Japan, the class that throughout the nation's feudal age, which ended only sixty years ago, set the standard to the whole people in manners, ideals of character, and mental and moral codes of obligation.
This is a revised and enlarged edition of a book whose subtle charm it is difficult to express in a paragraph. It is so packed with thought; so attractive in style; so rich in comparative illustrations of Oriental and Occidental ways of looking at things, with here and there a touch of satire, but never bigoted or narrow.

Borah Defends United States Foreign Policy

preservation of their rights and privileges from partisan leadership, when they see a political party earnestly advocating proposals as constitutional under the party administration and denouncing as unconstitutional the same measures and principles under another party's administration. Every political party, Federalist, Democratic, Whigs, Republicans, have zigzagged through our constitutional history, and their tracks out and in, going and coming, leaves one in doubt until you ascertain where their opponents are located. Partisanship has its place, but it is never a safe guide touching those things which are non-partisan, such as constitutional government and changes which it should undergo.

"Few of our people, if any, fail to realize the strain which is now placed upon our constitutional system. Few, if any, I venture to believe, fail to fully appreciate what its preservation means to their children. And, if in the consideration of those matters which will relate to the essential principles of constitutional government, we can have the untrammelled and uncontrolled judgment of the American people, the changes which may be made, or proposed and rejected, we can safely assume will not imperil our children's heritage.

"What I have said will be considered no doubt as impolitic. But the soundness of my contention can not be disputed in the light of constitutional history in the United States. Whether Democrats or Republicans, when we approach the problems which involve our system of government, we are Americans! There is compensation to be found in almost all things, and it will be close to a divine blessing if this crisis leads the people to erect a constitution "wailing wall" where all political parties may come in contrition and repentence and consider of their constitutional sins.

"It seems too probable now that Europe is to have another war. While the world is struggling to break the depression brought on in a large measure by the World War, nations are maneuvering toward another conflict. While women and children are hungry and improverished, vast profits are being realized and great sums expended for instruments fit only for the destruction of human up the question of constitutional govbeings. This situation also brings ernment. If we permit ourselves to be drawn into another foreign war or into a policy which would engage us from time to time in the hazardous enterprise of uncovering aggressors, or chastizing supposed national culprits, we shall inevitably experience in time a change in our whole structure of government.

"The framers of our government were also the authors in the first instance of our foreign policy.. They believed then, as many people believe now, that the foreign policy of a popular government should be as free from foreign entanglements as their domestic policy, that the former is as essential to the vital liberty of the people as the latter. People who are not wholly free at any particular juncture of their foreign affairs to remain neutral or to take up arms have already succumbed in practice, if not in principle, to the doctrines upon which all arbitrary governments rest. The more nearly the power to have peace or make war is under the control of the people, the more certainly will there be peace. The fateful situation in Europe tonight arises out of the fact that those who must make the sacrifice in case war comes, have no voice as to whether there shall be peace or war. If speech were free, the press uncontrolled, liberty of action upon the part of the people unrestrained, if constitutional government prevailed throughout Europe, there would be little danger of war.

"During the closing days of the session, Congress passed a Joint Resolution unmistakably pointing the course of this nation in the event of a foreign war, or wars. In technical scope the Resolution is far from complete. None knew this better than those of who, as a subcommittee of the Committee on Foreign Relations, gave days and even weeks to its consideration. But even so, its import and its purpose are clear and unmistakable. It plainly discloses that it is the policy of this nation to remain aloof from all foreign wars. Whatever may be the inadequacy of the Resolution in fully covering the subject with which it purpots to deal, due notice is registered as to what our policy is to be. No one supposed, or should suppose, that the Resolution in and of itself will serve to keep us free from foreign wars. It is, however, a step in that direction. It plainly marks a milestone in our return to the long-established policy of this government—'Peace, Commerce, and honest friendship with all nations—Entangling alliances with none.'

"It is fortunate that the purport of the Resolution has not been misunderstood or its significance underestimated abroad. Nothing contributes to good understanding between nations more than a firm and well-defined foreign policy. A weak, or uncertain, foreign policy inevitably invites contempt if not attack. If it be well understood once and for all among all nations that the United States has returned to the policy which it maintained with firmness, dignity, and success for more than a century; that we will seek within justice and honor to establish and maintain friendship with all nations; that we will neither interfere with their political affairs nor permit them to interfere with ours, with such an understanding is bound to come greater respect from and far more cordial relations with all peoples.

"The hopes entertained that the Great War was to give us a new world have not been realized. We are compelled to shape our course and determine our policy in the midst of affairs but little different from what they were when our government was organized. The weight of armaments is heavier now than at any time in recorded history, except in the midst of war. Boundary lines are yet unsatisfactory. The urge for expansion and the demand for territory are little different than to abandon old policies once accepted 150 years ago. We should not hasten to abandon old policies once accepted as wise until we are sure conditions have changed which made those policies necessary.

"The traditions, policies and precepts of our country, domestic or foreign, which have become interwoven in the moral and intellectual fibre of our people, the traditions, customs, mode and standards of living, are a part of the people's wealth, an indispensable part of a nation's strength and the surest guarantees of continued national power. The test of greatness in a people has always been capacity to build the new into the old, to graft the demands of the present onto the experience of the past. It is wise to preserve as well as to create. We should not indulge in false theories or false hopes. The stakes are too heavy.

normal values are considered.

Dwelling Space Most Active

Until recently most of the activity as far as larger investments were concerned was confined chiefly to hotels and apartment houses. During the last summer, however, seven East Flagler Street business properties have changed hands, and three downtown office buildings and numerous smaller business blocks have been purchased for investment or business use.

Indications point toward an excellent tourist season this year. Advance inquiries for house and apartment accommodations are being received in large numbers and hotel reservations are said to be heavier than in recent years.

Little advance, if any, is expected in hotel and apartment rates. Owners and agents realize that reasonable rates, in the long run, will yield a more certain return on their investment. In the apartment buildings managed by our company there will be no general advance in rates this year.

House rentals also can be expected to be reasonable. No general advance in rentals has been noted in the listings received to date at our four offices, and in quite a number of instances homes and estates are being offered at lower rentals than were asked last season.

There undoubtedly will be, as always, some few who will ask rates that are not in keeping with the type of accommodations and service rendered. Most occurrences of this kind in previous years have been caused by speculators who leased hotels and apartments in the hope of a quick and easy profit and whose sole interest was to squeeze every possible dollar out of guests without thought of the future.

Winter visitors can best protect themselves against unreasonable rates and unfair treatment by seeking accommodations in hotels and apartment buildings that are operated by owners themselves or by established management agencies which have a reputation to maintain.

Third Edition Appears As Author Is Honored On Her 80th Birthday

Yu Rin En, the settlement work and playground for children, celebrated the 80th birthday of the founder, Annie Shepley Omori Saturday 7 in a thoroughly characteristic manner

There was no set program, but the guests who thronged Madame Omori's dwelling during the afternoon made impromptu speeches appropriate to the occasion, Representatives of social welfare work spoke in appreciation of her long services. Leaders of Women's education had something to say. A delegate from the office of the Mayor of Tokyo spoke a few words as well as representative persons in Yodobashi who have been associated with the Yu Rin En. Many of the former assistants and old boys trained under Madame Omori returned to honor this octogenarian leader of settlement work in Tokyo

An impromptu program was given in the children's library, girls in bright kimono danced, others sang, and Mr. and Mrs. Seifu Yoshida, long friends of Madame Omori gave a flute and koto duet.

Madame Omori received her guests in her own apartment which was filled with masses of bright flowers from friends in all part of the city. The greatest variety of gifts poured in during the day.

Outside, the compound was crowded with children who watched pantomime plays on an improvised platform. It was a gala day for the Yu Rin En of Yodobashi.

A pleasant feature of the celebration was the appearance of the third edition of "Diaries of Court Ladies of Old Japan" on Madame Omori's birthday.

It was translated by Annie Shepley Omori and Professor Kochi Doi of the Sendai Imperial University, and has just been published in Tokyo by the Kenkyusha

The book contains three diaries by Court Ladies who lived 900 years ago in the Heian period. It was first brought out by Houghton and Mifflin, Boston, in 1923, but the first and second editions became exhausted.

One of the diaries is by Murasaki Shikibu. The Sarashina Diary begins when, as a child, the author took the journey from a spot north of Tokyo to Kyoto when her father, a province governor, was returning to the court of Kyoto. This journey required two months of continuous travelling and is described in great detail. The third diary in the book is by Izumi Shikibu, and records her love affair with a prince.

Madame Omori's manuscript on the life of Shotoku remains yet unpublished, but if issued should be a valuable contribution to the literature in English on Japan.

Origin Of Speech Is Attributed To Signs Rather Than Sounds

Human speech is the child of gesture, rather than the offspring of varied sound. Today, words can be traced back to movements of the mouth which convey meaning, not by sounds but by signs.

This is the basic theory on which Sir Richard Paget has relied in establishing a new avenue of approach to knowledge of the spoken word, according to the Christian Science Monitor. Sir Richard's latest work "This English" carries investigation to a point where it has become possible not only to trace community of origin amongst corresponding words in different languages, but to judge which of various dialects approaches nearest to the original form. Indeed the possibility of building up a stem language has been brought within sight.

Proves Theories

A preface by the Rector of Exeter College, Oxford, forming part of the book, tells a story showing how considerable are the potentialities of this line of research. After a lecture at Oxford in which Sir Richard had unfolded his theory, the Rector of Exeter College challenged him to to apply his method to the interpretation of some unknown tongue. The Professor of Chinese was called in and supplied a string of monosyllables belonging to the most obscure Oriental language available.

"The end of my tale, I might almost say the moral," says the Rector "is that Sir Richard Paget registered over 50 per cent of hits that were more or less upon the target, some of them indubitable bulls."

In its simplest form the method is illustrated by considering words like "far," "grand" and "great," all indicating bigness, and all necessitating wide opening of the mouth. Contrast these with such words as "tiny," "small," and "trifling," where minuteness is indicated by the fact that they can be pronounced only by reducing the space between the lips to very small dimensions.

The word "I" and its equivalents in other languages require for their pronunciation a position of the tongue not difficult to recognize as pointing inward towards the speaker's own breast. "Go," "come," and other basic verbs suggest in the thrusting out or drawing in of the lips, motion away from or toward the speaker. Such a word as "smooth" is another example. Here the tongue has to be laid flat upon the floor of the mouth, thus illustrating what the word implies.

Clues to Meanings

In English, he goes on to say "practically every word that begins with sp- means something which carries to a point or jet, or to small dimensions, similarly, nearly all the words that end in -sp (such as asp, wasp, wisp, cusp) also mean something that ends in a point, or a coming together, as in clasp and grasp. Nearly every word that begins in str- imports the idea of extending fore and aft, and so on.

"If this principle were consistently followed we could at once form some idea of the meaning of a word that we did not know, by simply realizing the mouth gesture which produced it—even though we should still have to guess, from the context, which of the alternative meanings of the mouth gestures was intended.

Stresses Articulation

"We should also have a solid basis of fact on which to build new words, or even to form a synthetic universal language—if such a language is needed."

He warns the English-speaking peoples that by careless articulation they are today in danger of losing significant gestures which are well worth preserving in the interests of intelligibility. His researches help to elucidate what these gestures are and why they ought not to become blurred.

Troops Led By 'Bobby' Reflect British Stand

An incident reflecting the authority of the English policeman has just been recalled in London. The might of Britain's army was marching in procession through London. At the head was no brilliant scarlet uniform and flashing sword, but an ordinary blue-uniformed policeman!

A spectator, Marshal Foch, French general in command of the allied armies in the World War, expressed surprise, says the Christian Science Monitor.

"But, my dear Marshal," Field-Marshal Sir Henry Wilson replied, "there you have the British Constitution in a nutshell—subordination of the military power to the civil authority."

The incident as it occurred in 1919 is now recorded in an introduction by Lord Hailsham, present-day Lord Chancellor, to "The War Office" by Hampden Gordon. The book is an addition to the Whitehall series of volumes dealing with British Department of States.

mulate a long-range plan of such works, in addition to one to meet immediate labor requirements, so that if depression again falls on the Dominion, the plans will be ready for immediate absorption of surplus labor.

Help for Farmers

The gap between prices of farm products and current costs, which caused so serious a depression in a country depending on export for 89 per cent of its national income, has been bridged by the double process of imposing a high exchange rate of £125 on sterling, which improved the farmers' realizations when turned into New Zealand currency, and a steady policy of interest reduction enforced by legislation, and covering not only interest on private and public securities, but rentals, and rates of bank overdraft.

Budgetary stability was recovered during the year ended March 31 last, when a surplus of £1,600,000 was disclosed, this being largely due to profits of £1,360,000 from the sale of gold taken over from the trading banks against the issue of notes by the Reserve Bank which has the sole right of note issue in the Dominion.

Important revenue items showed improvement, with the result that the budget announced further restorations in cuts made in pensions and public servants' salaries.

Social Credit Plan Sharply Discounted By Boston Economist

Ralph V. Wilson, vice-president of Babson's Reports, Inc., of Boston, in a recent address in Toronto, Canada, before a group of businessmen on economic trends stated that the closing months of the Conservative administration were marked with vigorous and sustained natural recovery, and Canadian business is moving steadily ahead with purchasing power the best in four or five years in many agricultural sections. Conditions in Canada are more optimistic than in the United States, according to Mr. Wilson.

The principles of the social credit theory advocated by Major Douglas are unsound, declared Mr. Wilson, in an address before the Young Men's Canadian Club, and social credit will not be accepted generally by Canadians, but it will be confined to the province of Alberta, says the Christian Science Monitor.

During 1936 Mr. Wilson believes that business recovery in Canada will cross the normal line and enter once again the level of overproduction, but he warned against over-production, which has a tendency to make business react abnormally. Real prosperity lies in advancing to only about 18 per cent above the normal business level line.

The position of the country is enhanced by the enviable wheat situation, with Canada obtaining nearly half of the available world supply. He predicted that the Western farmer would be in his best position since 1930.

Berlin Diplomatic Corps Against Laws On Jews

even more serious in the second degree's extramarital relations clauses, which seem likely to make Germany what The Times of London recently called it—a "paradise for blackmailers."

That these provisions are more than of mere academic interest is shown by several recent cases.

Rudolph Selz, a British subject of Jewish extraction, was recently arrested in Munich on the charge of "racial defilement." After the most strenuous protests by the British Government he was released, but his passport has been retained by the authorities so he is unable to leave Germany. Presumably he therefore still faces trial on the charge and his only protection is an unyielding determination on the part of the British Government not to recognize these discriminations against any of its subjects.

Lev Smechow, born in Poland of Jewish parents, but now Stateless because during a long residence in Germany he permitted his nationality to lapse and can claim only a Nansen passport, was sentenced to nine months' imprisonment by a court in Altona, near Hamburg.

Details of the Case

At his trial he testified that a German woman, a member of a Nazi organization, had smiled at him in a cafe and had afterward taken an automobile ride with him. She demanded money, he said, and when he refused it she made a disturbance and charged him with making improper proposals to her.

The court found in this case that no act of impropriety had actually occurred. However, said the court, the law applied not only to German Jews but to Jews generally, and it had been the accused's intention to commit an impropriety, therefore he was guilty of "attempted race defilement" and had grossly violated the German people's hospitality and must be punished.

There is the further case of Edmond Thomas, not a Jew, who was sentenced to nine months' imprisonment at Cologne for having had relations with a Jewish woman.

Thus it is obvious that any tourist, whether Jewish or not, may easily under these laws become the prey of blackmailers, of which Germany, in common with all other countries, has her share. It accounts for the perturbation it is diplomatic corps, whose duty it is to look ahead and avert trouble instead of waiting until trouble occurs.

But why at this juncture, when Germany is seeking to attract world tourists to the Olympic Games and is basing so much of her economic hope on that prospect the framers of the new laws failed to envisage this handicap to that economic hope seems inexplicable.

Blow to Olympic Head

This particular section of the law can scarcely be other than a direct slap in the face for Count Rene Baillet-Latour, president of the International Olympic Committee, who in a letter to his colleagues published in the German newspapers today stated:

"Permit me to inform you that the conversation I have had with the Chancellor of the German Reich as well as my own investigation have convinced me that no objections can be made against leaving the eleventh Olympics in Berlin and Garmisch-Partenkirchen.

"The conditions fixed by the Olympic statutes are being respected by the German Olympic Committee. Visitors and participants may be certain that they will find a hearty welcome without running any danger whereby their principles would in any way be violated."

The good faith of the German Olympic Committee is probably beyond question. Unfortunately the committee does not seem to have had any hand in framing these new laws been obtained by this method, particularly in the correction of high blood pressure. His studies of apes are expected to yield valuable analogies to the human system.

"I really can't talk now," Dr. Crile told interviewers. "This is only a beginning, you know. When I return, that should be another matter."

Admiral Grayson Also Aboard

Also sailing aboard the Ile de France was Rear Admiral Cary T. Grayson, chairman of the American Red Cross, bound for Paris and the meeting of the International League of Red Cross Societies on November 25 and 26. He said he planned to pass only four days in Europe, returning aboard the same ship. Among the subjects to be taken up at the conference, he said, would be Red Cross service in connection with the Italo-Ethiopian war. Ethiopia had accepted an offer of assistance from the international group, Admiral Grayson said, but Italy declined a similar offer, saying that the national organization was proving sufficient.

Two young Red Cross workers, Olga T. Frank and Alice Jefferson, were invited by the French Line to board the ship and seek contributions before sailing time. Admiral Grayson congratulated the girls and posed with them for photographs.

Also among the passengers on the Ile de France were Prince Eugene de Ligne, counselor and charge d'affaires at the Belgian Embassy in Washington; Captain Woolf Barnato, British sportsman; Nelson Dean Jau, Paris banker, and Cicely Courtneidge, British actress, with her husband, Jack Hulbert.

UNUSUAL DISPLAY

Homespun cotton materials from before the Meiji period are being shown on the second floor of the Shiseido drug store on the Ginza. The Minanto-ya at Sukuyabashi has scoured the countryside to obtain the cloth, which they found made up into old pillows, bed coverings and other household articles.

Ripping the articles to pieces, they washed and ironed the cloth and, as they expected, the design showed up as bright as when it was new for the cloth had been dyed with indigo which withstands the wear of time and gets clearer with successive washings. Those interested in design and the fireside textile industry will find the exhibit worth a trip, although some of the attendants at the exhibit may insist the cloth is of recent manufacture—some of it is the most interesting, dates from before the Meiji period.

Tientsin Stirred By News Of Riot InTangku,Jenchiu

Chinese, Armed With Revolvers, Demand Immediate Declaration Of Autonomy

Rengo

TIENTSIN, Dec. 9—A tense atmosphere prevailed here today following receipt of the news of rioting in Tangku and Jenchiu, some 60 miles southwest of Tientsin.

According to reports reaching here early this morning, a group of some 40 Chinese demonstrators, armed with revolvers, demanding an immediate declaration of autonomy by the local authorities, stormed the headquarters of the Tangku Bureau of Public Safety. The demonstrators, it is reported, later occupied it after Mr. Wu Lung-fu, director of the bureau, fled towards Tientsin.

Troops Rushed

It is also reported that a force of troops, belonging to General Shang Chen's Provincial forces, were rushed to the scene of the rioting, and dislodged the rioters from the headquarters.

There is, however, every indication of recurrence of similar disturbances and the local authorities are taking strict precautionary measures, the reports added. The Japanese Garrison forces stationed in the town are also reported to be standing by in view of the serious situation.

Simultaneously with the riot in Tangku, it is reported today from Jenchiu that a party of some 2,000 Chinese demonstrators, partially armed, attacked the magistrate's headquarters. They called themselves "Armed Petitioners' Corps for autonomy." The magistrate and other officials of the local authorities, including the director of the Peace Preservation Corps, are reported to have been taken prisoner by the demonstrators and confined in the headquarters.

Committee To Dissolve

Meanwhile, it is reliably reported here today that the Anti-Communist Autonomous Committee for Eastern Hopeh, headed by Mr. Yin Ju-keng, has decided to dissolve itself and join the Political Council of Hopeh and Chahar Provinces, upon its inauguration, which is expected in the immediate future.

Following incorporation of the committee into the Political Council, it is further reported, the demilitarized zone will be organized into a special administrative district to be placed under a new organ to be created later. Mr. Yin is expected to be appointed head of the new body.

U.S. Chamber Visions Halt In Federal Relief

States And Cities Now Able 'To Bear Larger Share Of Burden, 'Review' Asserts

Reason to hope that the Administration will not call for further huge relief appropriations in the forthcoming session of Congress, but will insist that the states and their subdivisions carry the relief burden in the future was held out to American business interests recently by the Chamber of Commerce of the United States.

Holding that "economy in government promises to be a major issue in the next Congress," the chamber, in its weekly "Washington Review," called attention to improvement in the economic positions of the states and municipalities which, it suggested, enabled them to carry a larger relief load, says the New York Herald Tribune.

The Chamber of Commerce, in its summary said:

"With the convening of Congress only a little more than six weeks away, business interest increasingly centers upon the prospects of new legislation, as it may tend to encourage or to retard the present upward swing toward economic recovery.

"Burdensome Laws" Deplored

"There has been given a promise that the major program of legislation affecting business has been completed and that a breathing spell lies ahead. Business earnestly hopes that the breathing spell may last throughout the Congressional session, Restrictive and burdensome laws recently enacted have slackened the pace of business recovery.

"Even though business as such is given a respite from hampering laws in the next session, there still are pressing problems of vital importance to business still awaiting solution. Uppermost in the business mind is the attitude that Congress will take regarding present excessive government expenditures. Now that the emergency is passing, business believes that recovery and relief expenditures should be drastically curtailed and that the national income and outgo should be brought more nearly into balance. There have been indications in recent weeks that Congressional leaders are thinking this way, too. Economy in government promises to be a major issue in the next Congress.

Spending Curb Foreseen

"The Federal budget for the fiscal year 1936-'37, now being whipped into shape by the President, will be submitted to Congress when it convenes. It will reveal the Administration's position on future spending policies. The absorbing point of interest is whether the Administration will again ask for more billions to carry on new works programs or whether it will call a halt and limit its relief expenditures to whatever amount it considers necessary to aid the states in caring for the unemployed.

"There are strong intimations that the Administration intends to insist that the states and their subdivisions carry the burden of relief in the future. Improvement in the economic position is such that they are fully capable of bearing a larger load.

"Business, speaking through the chamber, has consistently held that the states and their local governments can handle relief more effectively and economically than can the Federal government. This point of view appears to be gaining steady popular support.

"The chamber, through its 1,500 member organizations, will continue vigorously its drive for economy in government during the forthcoming session."

EXPLANATION OF TODAY'S CARTOON

Father of 72

Jacob Hunter's record, which ranks him with the Great Fathers of his State, still lives in the oral traditions of his descendants. The old patriarch, who attained to the age of 5 score and 6, was married 5 times and was the father of 72 chidren. To the last, he preserved a full set of teeth, and was a picture of rugged health. The respective ages of his children were so widely spread, that some of the brothers were strangers to one another. It was impossible to gauge the number of Hunter's descendants surviving to the present day, but they are undoubtedly very numerous.

Films Buy War Heroes' Medals For $1.50 Each

Armistice Day always is the darkest day of the year for Tom Little, veteran custodian of the property room at a major Hollywood movie studio.

In spite of himself, he looks at the medals. They are of every degree and from every nation. Each represents some forgotten act of heroism. Tom Little knows the stories of some of them—how they came to their owners and what the price was in blood and suffering, says the New York Times.

"We buy them for about $1.50 apiece," he said today. "Sometimes the boys go out and get whole bunches of them at once for even less."

Glory is pretty cheap by the time it reaches a studio "prop" room.

Mr. Little picked up a Croix de Guerre and a Distinguished Service Cross and said they belong to a disabled American soldier.

"He lost a leg getting one of them," Little said. "They were the last things he sold. A pawn shop got them."

There are twelve Croix de Guerre in the collection. The Service Cross, only one of its type in the group, was bought from a San Diego loan shop, Mr. Little said.

Medals cast by the Imperial Russian Government are the most plentiful, the custodian said. More than 100 of these lie in indexed cases, awaiting uses. Two are the Alexandrian Crosses, which are rarely found in the United States.

Elsewhere one finds the famous Iron Cross of Germany and decorations of the Austrian, Rumanian and Belgian Armies.

There is only one Victoria Cross, highest of all British decorations.

"Their sale is prohibited," Mr. Little said. "But we always had trouble getting them, even before the ban. An Englishman would rather starve than sell that medal."

N.Y.U. Discards Its Pre-Medical 3-Year Course

Shifts Stress To The Arts, But Students Still Can Prepare For Medicine

The three-year medical preparatory course, with its definite title and organization, has been eliminated from the curriculum of the New York University College of Arts and Pure Science, Dean Archibald L. Boulton disclosed recently in his annual report to Dr. Harry Woodburn Chase, university chancellor. Although it will still be possible for a student to prepare for medical school in three years, this action by the faculty of the college has been designed to shift emphasis in medical preparation from technical studies to liberal arts studies, Dean Boulton said, according to the New York Herald Tribune.

The dean announced two other important revisions in the curriculum: Restriction of the privilege of entering the university's law school after three years to students of high scholastic averages, and liberalization of degree requirements, including discontinuance of Latin requirements for admission to the course leading to the Bachelor of Arts degree, and discontinuance of the degree of Bachelor of Science in chemistry.

Faculty to Study Major Field

In conjunction with these changes, the faculty soon will consider the general problem of study in major fields and the related problems of comprehensive examinations, Dean Bouton said.

He explained that the revisions had been made to reduce the "pressure" exerted upon liberal arts colleges by professional schools, which have virtually transformed the arts colleges' training "into a kind of sub-professional medical school."

"That this does violence to the true purpose of a cultural preparatory course in liberal arts has become apparent not only to the faculty of the University College, but, of late, to the faculty of our own College of Medicine as well," Dean Bouton wrote. He added that the abolition of the three-year pre-medical course had been planned in co-operaton with the authorities of the medical school to widen the student's range of cultural electives.

In reporting the abolition of the Latin requirements, Dean Bouton pointed out that the only difference between the Bachelor of Arts and Bachelor of Science degrees had been that four years of preparatory school Latin, supplemented by a year's work in a classical language in college, were required for the B. A. degree. As a consequence, many high school graduates had been forced to accept the Bachelor of Science course while the arts course was falling into disuse, Dean Bouton said.

126 Points for B.A. Degree

Under the new requirements, students who matriculated in September, 1935, will receive the B. A. degree after having obtained at least 126 points of liberal arts credit; the B. S. degree will require at least ninety-six points of liberal arts credit.

The present rules of the University College permit students who have taken three years of work in liberal arts to register for the first year in the University Law School. Hereafter this privilege will be restricted to students who have attained a scholastic average approved by the scholarship committee.

"It is interesting to note," Dean Bouton said, "the existence of sentiment in favor of this restriction on the part of the most qualified students now in the University College."

Young Kabuki Actors Excel In Father's Plays

Kanya in Short Play

Kanya and Danshiro are seen briefly in a one act play by Jiro Sekiguchi, "Young Man and Robber." The scene is elaborate for so short an offering, a fantastic gnarled tree in mid-stage, with a lake and blue night sky in the background. By a camp fire Kanya sits as a discontented youth who wishes to escape from life. He has tried to hang himself to a limb of the tree. He points a pistol to his head, but fails in his attempts. A robber enters and is about to kill him but is disarmed when his victim welcomes the knife at his breast. The result of their interview is that the robber is frightened and runs away and the melancholy youth is again anxious to live.

Fukusuke is Success

Tokyo may be proud of Fukusuke, who though not yet out his teens gives every indication that he is already able to carry on the traditions of his late father, and of his grandfather, Utayemon. He appears as Kasane, opposite Kanya who is seen as Yoyemon in the posture play in which Uzaemon and Baiko appeared together so often with so much distinctino. Fukusuke's lame dance as the disfigured Kasane is accomplished surprisingly well.

Senjaku as Jihei

Senjaku again appears in one of Ganjiro's best roles, Jihei of the paper shop. Hanasuke plays with him as the long-suffering wife Osan. There are moments when Ganjiro's acting is recalled. Senjaku copies his father's gestures so closely, but again there is a lapse as though the young actor was not able to fill the place left vacant by his father.

The last play on the Meijiza program gives Gato, Danshiro, Kanya and Shoen an opportunity to star. The piece with a long title is a lively one, having revenge as the theme. It was published in the December issue of "Butai," (Stage) and has thus been quickly brought before the footlights.

The opening scene in front of the steps of a country temple shows a mob beseiging the place where there is a bad priest who has defrauded the people. Danshiro acts as the evil priest, while Kanya and Gato are friends trying to kill the priest for the misfortunes he has brought upon their master. Shoen as the master's daughter who has become a courtesan, makes an excellent impression, and his acting with Danshiro is of a high order. Alone with the villain who pretends to go to sleep, the girl creeps out of the room, but he wakes suddenly and calls her back. She draws her knife, and is about to be overcome when Kanya comes in a boat, and there is a spectacular fight.

The Meijiza program is long, but holds the audience to the end, and the enthusiasm of the players is communicated to the onlookers who enjoy the plays from beginning to end.

Ethiopian Army Steps To Strains Of 'Dixie'

Ten thousand Ethiopian warriors bound for the front recently marched before Emperor Haile Selessie to the tunes of two famous American songs, "Dixie" and "The St. Louis Blues."

Surprised natives had their first sight of cornets and trombones, and one extraiong saxaphone was tooted by a lanky Wallegan, says the New York Herald Tribune. The usual native drums and flutes were included in the band, giving a new turn to the syncopation.

"Well, madam," said the Back Bay maid, "I'll sweep out the dirt."

RKO-Radio picture. A Southern feud is the basis of the hilarious situations.

The inimitable comedians portray down-on-their-luck vaudeville magicians who pose as Southern gentlemen when their infant ward falls heir to a vast estate in Kentucky. How the trio becomes involved in a family feud and their efforts to extricate themselves forms a rollicking romance, with gay melody, modern dancing by eye-filling beauties, and a friendly war between two clans with Colts and Remingtons.

Mary Carlisle, the blonde ingenue, plays the daughter of the hostile Colonel, portrayed by Noah Beery. "Spanky" McFarland of "Our Gang Comedy" fame is seen as the orphan. "Kentucky Kernels" introduces locally the catchy melody, "One Little Kiss." In the film, the song is a musical background for some eye-filing dances by a chorus of gorgeous girls; and several members of the cast offer pleasing vocalizations.

Overseas League Hears Interesting Speech By Teeling

Visitor Tells Of Travels, Expresses Views On World Problems

Mr. L. W. B. Teeling, a recent visitor to this country from England where he writes for the London Times, was the principal speaker at a meeting of the Overseas League held in Yokohama on Sunday with Consul General Hamilton Holmes in the chair.

Mr. Teeling referred to his travels in recent years. He found in some of the Dominions certain interests who would exploit or suppress news from Great Britain as it suited their purposes. The Empire was however an organization in which every pact should find the full facts about other pacts and there was therefore a great necessity for some group to spread such information that has no use to grind either financial, industrial, political or religious. He also found in the United States often a great misunderstanding of British actions. This he later found during his tours of Germany, Italy, France, and the Far East to be equally prevalent. In these countries Britishers could do much to make them both known. But how can they do it if they do not know the facts themselves? The average Britisher abroad is mixed up with his own business affairs. He must again find some group, that does not touch on politics to rely on for his information. Whether this body should be the Overseas League or some other is not material. Suffice that the Overseas League already exists, and has the hall mark of Royal approval, and a competent non-Jingoistic bdy direct its affairs. Therefore it should at least be assisted.

Today we all talk of possible coming wars. We look on the black side of each country and we know of each country's faults, quite enough without their being further discussed. Let us try and see their better points.

Germany in recent years, thanks to a new spirit, has undoubtedly restored a spirit of national self-respect and of sufficient confidence to find employment however temporary, for 4 millions of its 6 millions unemployed. No small achievement this. The Winter Help Organization has turned the suffering poor from being almost outcasts into ordinary human beings once again. The strength through Joy Movement has immeasurably improved the conditions of the lower ranks in industry. I am convinced this is not instilling a war spirit, but rather a spirit that would hold tight to what it has obtained and never risk it in war.

In Italy the physical improvement and the love of spirit has developed tremendously in recent years. The Italian is in every way a more efficient man than he was ten years ago. The Royal family is infinitely more popular. The Dopolavora (after work) organization developed in industry will remain long after Fascist has died down. A few months ago there was no desire for war in Europe amongst Italians. What will happen now none knows or who's fault it is.

This much is certain, had not the spirit of the peoples of Germany, France, Italy and Great Britain, become much more cultivated than they were in 1914, we would not be in the present situation. There may be a war, but even if there is Italy and Europe will come out of it at least one step nearer the Utopian ideal of permanent peace. For all peoples are fighting harder for peace today than they ever were before.

British subjects in every foreign country have a duty to perform when they go home on leave. It is to tell those at home what is this different form of a peace spirit which is different in every country. They can only do so through social bodies such as this Overseas League and when they go back to their countries they must have learnt about the movements in the British Empire to tell their foreign hosts these facts. First that the Empire is as proud as ever of its Monarchy and its traditions. Secondly that it has no intention of retiring from its world influence and is not diplomatic. Thirdly that its unemployed are not slackers, but are finding things to do for themselves. It is the British tradition not to do this through governments but without them and that is why it takes longer though it may in the end be more permanent. The Prince of Wales is at the head of such movements which include many hundreds of thousands of workers and many more thousands of leisured voluntary workers.

All these things cannot happen in a short time and the world will not stand still in between. Therefore there must be ups and downs. I feel that all over the world, in so far as it is practicable other countries would like to live as Britain lives. Britishers hold therefore a great responsibility abroad for they are watched. It is not only Embassies that must interpret British action, but ordinary Britisher in every day social intercourse. They cannot do this unless they know themselves what is happening. To do this they must be in touch with organization in their homelands. Which organization does not matter as long as it is reputable and up to date.

Each country has a contribution to offer for world problems from its own traditions but no country's advocate will convince unless he knows his own case thoroughly and believes it to be the right solution.

Coughlin Breaks With Roosevelt

Principles Of New Deal And Social Justice Union 'Unalterably Opposed,' Priest Says

The Rev. Charles E. Coughlin, who began to turn a mildly critical fire on the Washington scene two years ago, ran up his battle flags on Nov. 17 in Detroit, Mich., as a foe of the Roosevelt administration policies.

Declaring that the principles of the New Deal and those of his own widespread following, the National Union for Social Justice, "are unalterably opposed," Father Coughlin completed his break with the administration on questions involving money, labor and agriculture, according to the New York Times.

When the Roosevelt administration entered the White House, Father Coughlin supported the President, and coined the slogan: "Roosevelt or Ruin."

"On March 4, 1933, I was thrilled to the ringing words which promised to drive the money changers from the temple," he said today in his Sunday afternoon broadcast over a national hook-up.

"I thought that the death-knell for plutocracy had sounded.

"Today I humbly stand before the American public to admit that I have been in error. Despite all promises the money changer has not been driven from the temple."

He described his address today as an accounting of his stewardship of the National Union for Social Justice which he organized two years ago and for which he now claims 9,000,000 membership applications.

Father Coughlin charged the New Deal with supporting two extremes "communistic tendencies" and the "error plutocracy."

The administration, he said, supported a "slave wage" and not a living wage in its work relief programs. The Agricultural Adjustment Administration policies, he said, only "deceived the farmer with the hypodermic needle of the dole." He characterized the AAA as "economic hoaxing," and a "clever wedge between city and farm."

Discussing the Congressional enactment of labor legislation, including the NRA, Father Coughlin said:

"Did not the Presidential advisers recognize that the NRA was unconstitutional?"

"These facts impel me to suspect that the labor legislation enacted by this government was another phase of a sham battle to protect plutocracy at the expense of the Supreme Court's prestige."

Rockefeller Jr. Stops Annual Gifts To Church

Specific Agencies To Get Future Donations, Says Millionnaire

Forsaking the traditional practice of his father, John D. Rockefeller Jr. has terminated his anuual monetary gifts to the Northern Baptist church in the belief that interdenominationalism is the best servitor of Christian religion, according to the Chicago Tribune.

In a letter to the Northern Baptist convention, written March 7, last but revealed only recently, the son of the founder of one of the world's greatest fortunes informed the church that henceforth any future gifts would be only to specific agencies of the church.

Cites "Divisive Force"

"I have long felt," he wrote, "that this denominational emphasis is a divisive force in the progress of organized Christian work and an obstacle to the development of the spirit and life of Christ among men."

To hold young people, Rockefeller said, who are largely unconcerned with denominational distinctions, the church must work with them "in relegating the non-essentials to a place of secondary importance and stand with them for the fundamentals of Christian duty."

Rockefeller, largest individual donor to the church, and like his father long a financial pillar, in the past has made annual donation ranging from $250,000 to a million dollars to the general budget of the Northern Baptist convention.

His highest single gift in the past to an agency of the church was in the neighborhood of $500,000.

Among Mr. Rockefeller's lavish gifts to the Baptist church in the past was the majoriy of funds for erection of the imposing Riverside church of which the Rev. Harry Emerson Fosdick is pastor.

The influence of Mr. Rockefeller as the largest donor to the Baptist church for 40 odd years has been felt throughout the national ramifications of the church

In 1932 it was announced that he had pledged $300,000 to the unified budget for the denomination for the current year.

Pledged $250,000 for Building

In 1926 he pledged $250,000 toward a million dollar building fund of the church and another $50,000 contingent upon other contributions.

However, he was not free from occasional criticism from within the church itself. In 1927 the Rev. Dr. T. T. Shields, president of the Baptist Bible Union of North America, charged that Mr. Rockefeller was sponsoring a plan of reorganization of the church which would make of it "a religious department of the Standard Oil company."

In reply Rockefeller issued a statement that he had no connection with the reorganization plan.

Roosevelt Rejects K. Of C. Plea To Aid Mexican Catholics

President Roosevelt rejected on November 17 the demand of the Knights of Columbus that his administration act to halt "persecution of religion by the Mexican Government."

In a letter to Martin H. Carmody, Supreme Knight of the order, the President set forth his refusal to permit the United States to "undertake a policy of interference in the domestic concerns of foreign governments and thereby jeopardize the maintenance of peaceful conditions."

Mr. Roosevelt made it clear that his stand was not to be interpreted as evidence of indifference and reiterated his abhorence of religious intolerance, whether in the United States or abroad.

The letter was made public by Mr. Carmody in his suite at the Waldorf-Astoria Hotel in New York City the some day. The K. of C. head issued a personal statement expressing disappointment that "the President takes the position that it will be the unalterable policy of his administration to do nothing to alleviate the misery and suffering of this unhappy people."

Mr. Carmody said that his organization would carry on its efforts in behalf of Mexican Catholics.

Pan Pacific Club Hears Reports On China, South Seas, Balkans

Four speakers addressed the Pan Pacific club's luncheon at the Imperial hotel Friday noon—Dr. Bunjo Nano, member of the House of Peers, told of his recent trip to the South Sea Mandate islands; Viscount Tadashiro Inouye told of the friendly sprit prevailing between engineers of China and Japan, basing his talk on a lecture tour he and other Japanese engineers made in China recently; Dr. Shigemoto Saegusa, Charge d'Affaires of the Japanese Legation in Greece, discussed the Balkan situation; and Professor Payson Jackson Treat of Stanford University, complimented the club for its internationalism.

Dr. Nano said:

"Calling at the Port of Davao, our chief interest was in the fact that it is inhabited by a Japanese community of over 14,000 people and that in a very real sense the place owes its existence and development to the present flourishing condition to the energy, perseverance and the pioneer spirit of the Japanese. It is quite inspiring to recall that only 30 years ago Davao was a hopelessly wild spot in the jungle untouched by civilisation, and frequently only by ferocious savages in the neighboring mountains; and that after repeated failures of Filipino and Chinese laborers it finally devolved upon the Japanese pioneers of Davao to explore and open up this region as an important area of Manila hemp plantation. At present, in addition to the 14,000 Japanese, there are some 45,000 Filipinos who are eigher working on or enjoying indirectly the benefits of Japanese enterprise. The Japanese there have under cultivation some 50,000 square Cho (cho is 2.45 acres) producing annual 10 million pesos worth of hemp and an invested capital of 50 million pesos. They have constructed 500 odd kilometers of perfect motor road where formerly there was no kind of road whatever. Thus Davao impressed us rather deeply as a monument to their patient effort and intelligent planning, and we sincerely hope and trust as the Governor General kindly assured us in the course of conversation at Manila, that the land problem, now pending will be settled in the near future both equitably and to the satisfaction of the parties concerned.

"At Davao we embarked on the Palau Maru and went on to the South Sea islands under Japanese mandate, Anguar, Palau, Yap, Tinian and Saipan. We found all of them very interesting from the social, cultural industrial and administrative points of view. As one interested in education I was pleasantly surprised at the remarkable progress in the instruction of native children, who seem to be as well looked after as the school children in Japan.

Viscount Inouye said:

"I would like to mention the attitude of the Nanking government towards us. We went there for just a day, for the purpose of paying our respects to the enginering department, to the Department of Foreign Affairs, and the Mayor of the City of Nanking. We were cordially received by the secretariat of all departments, and the secretary of the Foreign Affairs Department gave us a very cordial reception at a tea party, where we found many Chinese official who speak Japanese so that we were able to converse freely in our native tongue. Mr. Woo himself gave us welcome in Chinese, a speech which was very long and pro-Japanese. Two days later we learned of his accident.

"Our program in China was too limited, in fact our tour was a lecture tour more than a conference. But although the time was so short we believe that it has served to bring about better relations between the engineers of both countries, and I am sure that the next time we can put our scheme into a more concrete form we can make it a real conference for the benefit of both nations, something that the politicians will never be able to attain."

Dr. Sayegusa said:

"I conclude that the powder magazine in Europe has moved from the Balkans to the east and south east frontier of Germany. I do not mean that the Balkans can remain outside a general European conflagration, nor do I mean that they have gained semi-permanent neutrality with Scandinavian and Iberian Peninsular are enjoying. For for the time being we can focus attention on the German frontier, the colonies and semi-colonies including east Africa, and east Asia, where pressure of life is rather strongly felt."

Prince Tokugawa presided.

Roosevelt Must Rely On South, Farm West In '36

1928 six states out of that list including such strongly Democratic states as Texas and Virginia, voted against the Democratic nominee. But everybody knows that the conditions of that 1928 election, with ex-Governor Alfred E. Smith of New York as the Democratic nominee and Mr. Herbert Hoover as the Republican, the conditions were exceptional.

Will South Stay Solid?

However, let us be through with all this history. The question is: Will Mr. Roosevelt carry the Solid South next year? At the present moment there is little reason to doubt he will. Again, it is not logical, and it is not wholesome for the country or for the South, that the South should blindly go Democratic because of tradition—in an election in which the real issue is whether the American tradition about society and government, including the Democratic party tradition, shall be preserved. Here is an extraordinary irony: If the South next year votes for Mr. Roosevelt it will do so because of tradition, and by that act, if the vote of the South should result in another four years of the New Deal—by that act the South will have helped to destroy precisely those traditions about government which the South holds most dear.

I have talked with many leaders of Southern thought. Literally, without exception, all with whom I have talked have been appalled by the New Deal, have deplored Mr. Roosevelt's course. Hundreds and perhaps thousands of Southern leaders say this privately. Some of them say it publicly. The country is familiar with what Democratic Senators Carter Glass and Harry Byrd, of Virginia, have said about the New Deal. But nearly all of them predict, nevertheless, that the Southern states will next year support Mr. Roosevelt for the Presidency. If there is to be any really formidable movement in the South against Mr. Roosevelt it has yet to emerge.

Way Out for South

If the South wishes to cling to its Democratic tradition as respects the Presidential candidate, but at the same time wishes to throw its weight against the New Deal, there is a way to do it. It can vote for Mr. Roosevelt if it wishes, but at the same time can checkmate him (assuming he is reelected) from carrying America farther into what he calls a "new order," an order of society and form of government alien to American traditions.

The South has more than a quarter of the whole membership of the Lower House of Congress. It has more than a third of the Democratic majority in Congress as it now is. The South, if it wishes, can choose members of Congress who will resist the New Deal. The South can do this without casting a Republican vote. Members of Congress from the South are not really chosen in the election, as between Democrats and Republicans. Actually they are chosen in the Democratic primaries—who ever wins the contest for the Democratic nomination becomes, in almost all cases, the member of Congress.

And so, if the South wishes to throw its weight in favor of preserving what Mr. Roosevelt jeeringly calls the "old order:" if the South is really is shocked by the New Deal as many leaders of Southern thought say it is, it can express itself by retiring next year those Democratic Congressmen from the South who have voted always as the New Dealers said they should, the "Yes, sir, coming, sir" Congressmen as Mr. Hearst's newspapers describe them. And the South can do this while at the same time voting to re-elect Mr. Roosevelt. The South, in short, can live up to its Democratic tradition, can help to re-elect Mr. Roosevelt—but at the same time can see to it that as President he must be a Democrat, and not a Socialist nor any of the other things his critics call him.

Japan Times Publishes Second Album of Drawings By N. Nouet

A new album containing 52 pen drawings by Mr. Noel Nouet is published by the Japan Times and Mail today. This is the second series of his scenic views of Tokyo. His first album, issued last year by this paper, was highly appreciated by both foreign residents and Japanese art lovers.

The second album is bound with handmade Japanese paper. Mr. Yaso Sajio, famous poet, has written a poem about the author, which is printed in the preface of the album both in Japanese and French. Mr. Nouet has written a short history of Tokyo which is also printed in English and in French.

The 50 drawings in the text are reproduced with all possible attention to the printing process and the artistic mind. The drawings in this second album contain the scenic views around the Imperial Palace, French, British and America Embassies in Tokyo, principal office buildings, moats, bridges, the Meiji Shrine, the Yasukuni Shrine, parks, department stores, railway stations and some other noted monuments in the capital.

Mr. Nouet is a professor at the Tokyo School of Foreign Languages and at the Military College and is a talented poet as well. He came to Japan about eight years ago, since then he has lived in Shizuoka and Tokyo. The beauty of Japanese landscape and life caught his poetical mind and he began to make pen drawings as his hobby.

The Japan Times and Mail has run his principal drawings in its Sunday paper. All these drawings are in the album with explanatory notes in both English and French.

There are 65 pages, 52 drawings, and illustrated paper covers. The price is 2 yen.

Mr. Kenshu Wanibuchi, above, will be the soloist at the next program of the New Symphony orchestra, to be held at the Hibiya hall at 7:30 p.m. Tuesday. Mr. Hideo Saito will be the director and a program of Schubert, Bruch, and Bartok will be played.

SCHOOL NEWS

The third grade of the American school is now studying Switzerland, and is building miniature sections of the Alps in the class-room. Although the students have several modeling records, they are offering a reward for a live yodeler. The fourth grade is studying the beginning of the world, by the aid of shadow-pictures of prehistoric animals. Mr. Gressitt will later lead the young ideas starward, as he did last year.

The fifth grade is working on a dramatization of a story from the Iliad, while studying about the Greeks in their Social Science course. In the Junior High room, "The Weekly Gossip," a newspaper published at five sen per copy continues to flourish under its able editors, Kenneth Lamott, Henry Fisher, Alfred Bell, and Chandan Bulchand. The recent Thanksgiving issue contained many items of interest, well-drawn illustrations and an appropriate poem by Florence Mayer.

German Peasants Asked To Foil Plot

be delivered to hunger.

"Now, the hunger of the masses who have been alienated from the soil and who have been prepared, spiritually and organically, for bolshevization means the outbreak of desperation, which in turn means bolshevism. How ghastly near we were to an outbreak of bolshevism before National Socialism seized power most of you know, but the outside world has not sufficiently realized this.

"It is shown by the fact that the Communist vote in Germany grow from a few hundred thousand after the war to 6,500,000 at the election that brought us to power.

"How much the leaders of the Bolshevist world counted upon Germany as the next country to be conquered and as the future bridge for the bolshevization of the rest of Europe is proved by the discovery in the Karl Liebknecht House (dedicated a few days ago by Air Minister Goering to the National Socialist purpose under the name of the Horst Wessel House) of carloads of pamphlets in all languages and hidden in secret cellars ready for stirring up bolshevism among other peoples after Germany had been incorporated in the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics.

Praises Ruthless Procedure

"Call it faith or call it the work of Divine will that Adolf Hitler and his counter-organization came to power in that last hour. Only his ruthless procedure in breaking down bolshevism in Germany by the imprisonment of Communist leaders spoiled the calculations of the wirepullers of world revolution.

"Bolshevism, personified in the Jew, now conceals its war from without, for the Jewish boycott agitation against German goods has no other meaning. Through this the German food basis is to be broken down. Exports, already restricted by the general world depression, are to be strangled to such an extent that the importation of food must steadily decrease.

"The calculations are that German agriculture, already suffering, will not be able to produce sufficient food in the territory narrowed by the Versailles treaty, that hunger will yet prevail in Germany and, thereby, that the Hitler regime will, after all be replaced by Bolshevism."

From this argument, Mr. Hess proceeded to the conclusion that it was up to the peasants to defeat the plot and that "the agrarian battle of production is essentially a battle against Bolshevism." There was not a word concerning preference given to war material imports despite popular needs, and no indication that the boycott has been Jewry's reprisal for persecution and spoliation of its co-religionists in Germany.

Lesser lights spoke along the same line, and only Mr. Darre came near touching upon the armament question. He argued

"You can have no free peasantry without at the same time forging the sword that protects the freedom of the peasant."

Car Insurance Cut In Norway By Abstainers

Percentage Of Accidents With Other Companies Said To Be 65 Pct.

Reports for the first year of "Varde," Norwegian abstainers' own special motor insurance company, have been so successful that the premium is to be lowered, according to the Christian Science Monitor.

"Varde" was started in April, 1934, to give total abstainers in Norway their own insurance company as well as an opportunity of proving that nondrinking motorists are safer than those who drink.

The report for the first year states that the premium income was 22,451 crowns, or $5613, while the amount paid out in respect of damage was 2284 crowns, or $421.

Asked for Rebates

It is said that the percentage of accidents with other companies is about 65 per cent of those insured, while with "Varde" it is only between 10 and 20 per cent.

The Norwegian Automobilist Abstainers' Association, finding that year, after year its members drove without accidents, asked insurance companies two years ago for a rebate on premiums.

One company agreed to give a 10 per cent rebate, when the thought occurred to the associaton that it would be a great advance if an abstainers' insurance company could be founded.

Rapid Growth Indicated

It appeared that the minimum capital must be 50,000 crowns, or $12,500. The association decided to canvass members throughout the country. But, before this taks was started, the Norwegian Abstainers' Society donated 20,000 crowns. The remaining 30,000 crowns were subscribed before one third of the planned canvass had taken place.

Now "Varde" is expecting to grow. Police reports here show some 50 per cent of road accidents to be due in some measure to the effects of liquor. There is even a chauffeur service in Oslo, ready to drive anyone home who feels he is not capable of driving. And the general awakening to the dangers of alcohol is causing Norwegian abstainers to believe that the time is coming when their movement will spread rapidly.

'Hot Dogs' Of America New Guide For Russians

MOSCOW, Nov. 17—When Joseph Stalin, Soviet dictator, learned that Russians eat more than 500,000 "hot dogs" daily, he said to Food Commissar A. I. Mikoyan: "Go full speed ahead. In America there are people who have become millionaires manufacturing hot dogs. We must study America."

The dictator also urged greater soap production, Mr. Mikoyan said today in an address to a congress of the Soviet's fastest workers, 2,500 Stakhanoffists, in the great white palace of Moscow's Kremlin. This was the first meeting of the men and women labor champions.

A BLOW ON THE CHIN CAUSES THE JAW BONE TO BE DRIVEN INTO THE GLENOID CAVITY OF THE SKULL—SHOCKING THE SEMI-CIRCULAR CANALS IN THE EARS CAUSING — UNCONSCIOUSNESS

The "Button" Is In The Ear

When two heavy hitters like Baer and Louis open fire something is sure to drop.

Dr. D. E. White, well-known specialist, offers the following scientific explanation of just what happens when a knockout occurs:

"The common knockout—the blow to the "button" or point of the jaw—is the result of a disturbance of the semi-circular canals in the ears. These delicate canals of the inner ear are the balancing organs of the body. When the lower jawbone is struck with sufficient force on the point, the condyle, or boss, at the upper and inner end of the bone is driven forcibly up into the glenoid cavity of the skull, behind which is situated the delicate labyrinth of the inner ear. The jawbone strikes hard upon the thin plate of bone that supports these sensitive organs, and conveys a shock to the semi-circular canals that is instantly transmitted by them to the cerebellum—the back of the brain—producing dizziness and momentary paralysis."

to the defendant," the petition declared.

The petition asked the Supreme Court for opportunity to take additional testimony, a request previously denied by the New Jersey court.

Hauptmann "Trusts in God"

N. Y. Times

TRENTON, N. J., Nov. 12.—"I trust in God and justice," said Bruno Richard Hauptmann today as he learned that his appeal had been submitted to the United States Supreme Court. He was quoted by his spiritual adviser, the Rev. D. G. Werner, Seventh Day Adventist from the Bronx, who visited him in his cell in the death house at the State prison.

If the Supreme Court fails to save Hauptmann from the electric chair Supreme Court Justice Trenchard is expected to set a new date for his execution promptly. The original sentence of execution in the week of March 18 was stayed by appeals.

Hauptmann will have two possible moves left in case he is unsuccessful in the Supreme Court. He may ask for a new trial on the basis of new evidence, if any is available, or he may petition the State Board of Pardons for a commutation to life imprisonment.

Mrs. Lena Nakamura, member of the club and a well known soloist, sang a collection of German songs while Mrs. Juliot de la Morandiere delighted the audience with a group of French Christmas songs.

A highlight of the program was the singing of Christmas carols by about 25 girls from the American School under the direction of Miss Eloise Cunningham. They made an impressive entry to the auditorium from the rear, wearing long choir robes and carrying lighted candles.

Buchan 1st Literary Man To Get Viceregal Honors

tories of the war.

His latest book, published in England under the title of "The King's Grace," was a Silver Jubilee book, and from a publisher's point of view has proved to be the most successful of his more than fifty books. From a literary point of view its success has been no less remarkable. To set forth the unique constitutional staus of the British crown and to relate to it the tremendous events of the reign was a task which called for tact and dignity in its management. In Buchan's handling it was a beautifully finished and lucid piece of work, and it is typical of him that it was written in four months' time, mainly at week-ends.

Only the most economical management of his time could have carried him through the immense amount of work he has achieved. In the main stream of his life there have always been undercurrents and cross-currents. Not long after he emerged from Oxford he went to South Africa as Lord Milner's private secretary and it may be that political ambitions were implanted in him then.

Certainly nobody could have served under such a man as Milner without imbibing a view of imperial unity which was likely to color his whole life. Eight years ago he was elected M. P. for the Scottish universities and he remained in the House of Commons until he moved a few weeks ago to the crimson benches of the House of Lords.

The Commons has thrown its searching white light on him as the Commons has a way of doing. It has long been assumed of him that his ultimate ambitions were political, and in fact, very early in his career it was prophesied of him that he would do two things—write a history of Calvinism and become a Cabinet Minister. He has done neither. He has gone further than both.

The Commons showed that he had no knack for the rough and tumble of debate. His perfect composure and inbred dignity were above the hurly-burly. He was one of the most eloquent speakers in the House, diligent in amassing his facts and careful in polishing his presentation of them. But he was one of the few men who never lost the grand manner.

The resultant impression of him was a dual one. You felt on the one hand that his early promise in the Commons was never fulfilled. On the other hand, you felt that he was a man of greater weight than appeared in the daily hubbub of the House. He was in fact a close personal friend of Ramsay MacDonald, who appointed him Lord High Commissioner to the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland two years ago and again last year.

The Lord High Commissioner represents the King at the annual meeting of the Established Church in Scotland. For this one week of the year he lives in the palace of Holyrood in Edinburgh and moves about in royal state—a perfect apprenticeship for viceroys.

Mr. MacDonald has been mentioned as the influence behind this year's appointment to the Governor-Generalship of Canada, although the time has passed when British politicians have any official part in such appointments.

The Governor General today has no connection of any kind with the British Government. If the Canadian Government asked him to transmit a message to the government in London (which no Canadian Government would do) he would refuse to accept it. Messages between the two governments are transmitted through the Canadian High Commissioner in London and his opposite number to Ottawa. The colonial status which used to give Canadians a kind of inferiority complex has entirely disappeared.

As King of Canada, King George is governed by the advice of his Canadian Ministers, and this advice is tendered direct without the intervention of any third party. This at least is the theory of it. In practice it is tendered not to the King in London but to the Governor General in Ottawa, who deputizes for the King. During his term of office the Governor General has, therefore, the same limitations and is entitled to the same honors as the King himself. His first duty is that of the strictest constitutionalism. Within the limits permitted him by constitutional usage, he has the three rights which Bagehot enumerated—"the right to be consulted, the right to encourage and the right to warn."

As Commander-in-Chief in Canada he takes the salute when the militia marches past. As the most exalted personage in the Dominion his presence at a social function or the laying of a cornerstone serves as a guarantee of the most impeccable respectability. The qualities which these august duties require are those of great dignity, sound judgment an perfect taste, and these are exactly the qualities which Lord Tweedsmuir brings to his new post.

Orchard Of 15th Century Still Aids French Hospital

BEAUNE, France, Nov. 17—Wine from grapes of an orchard provided by Philip the Good in the fifteenth century was sold at auction today amid splendor since medieval times.

Wine buyers who mingled with singing and dancing towns folk clad in old burgundian costumes spent 600,000 francs for the wine sold by Beaune Hospital.

Philip the Good, then Duke of Burgundy, endowed the hospital with the vineyard so its earnings might provide care for poor patients.

Rockefeller Gives Apartment Plans

Two 11-Story Buildngs Of An Unusual Type To Rise In New York City

Plans for two eleven-story apartment houses of unusual type, to be erected by John D. Rockefeller Jr. on a large site in West Fifty-fourth and Fifty-fifth Streets, New York City were announced recently by the Rockefeller interests, following the filing in Albany of a certificate of incorporation for the operating company, to be known as the 17 West Fifty-fourth Street Corporation, according to the New York Times.

The project marks the entry of Mr. Rockefeller into the midtown apartment building field in a section just north of Rockefeller Center where there has been considerable buying of real estate by various interests within the past year, and where plans for other construction projects of importance have been reported.

The apartment buildings will occupy the plot at 17-23 West Fifty-fourth Street, running through to 24-36 West Fifty-fifth Street. The Fifty-fourth, Stret frontage is just across the street from the Rockefeller town houses and faces also several other residential properties that Mr. Rockefeller owns on the south side of the street.

Cost Estimated at $2,000,000

While the Rockefeller interests gave no estimate of the prospective cost of the new houses, realty men and builders figure that the investment, including the land, would be about $2,000,000.

About two-thirds of the plot of 25,000 square feet will be covered by the buildings. The remainder will be given over to private gardens and a "community promenade."

Then announcement that "it is Mr. Rockefeller's wish to develop thi property in a manner as significant to the midcity region for residential purposes as his great building group to the south is for business purposes" was construed in some circles to mean that Mr. Rockefeller might have plans for apartment buildings on other land in the district.

Other reasons given for the building operation were "the present insufficiency of modern and fully equipped small apartments of a high type in mindtown New York, and the desire of business executives in Rockefeller Center and near-by office buildings to have their homes within walking distance of their offices."

Plans for the buildings will be filed today with the Department of Buildings by J. Andre Fouilhoux and Wallace K. Harrison, two of the architects employed in the designing of Rockefeller Center. Barr, Irons & Lane will be the contractors.

Each house will have sixty suites of from three to six rooms, with two six-room duplex or two-story penthouses and a number of smaller penthouses. Some of the apartments will have private gardens. While no details as to the equipment were given out, it was reported that the houses would be air-conditioned. Such equipment thus far has been confined largely to business buildings.

Many Deals in District

In the four-block area just north of Rockefeller Center there has been marked realty activity during the last twelve months, with more than a score of apartments and old private houses changing ownership. Several of the purchases have been made by the Aeonitt Realty Corporation, represented by Sumner Gerard, whose address is 30 Rockefeller Plaza.

At least eight transfers of ownership have taken place this year in West Fifty-first Street, between Fifth and Sixth Avenues, and nine in the same block of West Fifty-second Street. There also have been several transfers in Fifty-third and Fifty-fourth Streets. Most of the properties of Mr. Rockefeller in that district, including the apartment site, have been held by him for many years, the exception being 18 West Fifty-fourth Street, which he acquired about six months ago.

Most of the Fifty-fifth Street frontage for the apartments already has been cleared of buildings.

sand on their shoulders. The ground was now consecrated by the bones of their ancestors, and over their remains was to be built a shrine to their honor. Under stress of years, or by fire or wind or the force of enemies, the frail structures collapsed. Then more tons of earth had painfully to be brought, and the cycle of building and destruction was repeated. At length, and probably after the elapse of hundreds of years, the natives ceased to build and began to bury their dead in graves dug into the sides of the structure.

Equally perplexing with the striated color scheme of Mound C. is a series of fourteen well defined clay steps built within the west shoulder of the mound and extending from the base to the summit of the first unit of the structure. Lacking any positive means of identifying their purpose, Dr. Kelly believes that the mound was intended for ceremonial purposes when it was first built and then subsequently for burial purposes. Some form of temple or shrine may have capped the mound in its earliest period, but no trace of it remains today.

Mound A Forty-five Feet High

Mound A is interesting more for its size than for the value of the relics which it has thus far yielded. In fact, its very massiveness has rendered complete exploration impossible. It rises forty-five feet into the air, dwarfing the trees of the surrounding plateau, and its roughly circular base is more than 300 feet in diameter. Dr. Kelly ordered a perpendicular shaft sunk through its core, and though it was braced and shored just as a mine shaft is protected against caveing a layer of sand deep in the interior began to shift and made further work impossible. Lateral trenches dug into the sides of the mound indicated that a village had once stood there, sluce fragments of timbering and baked clay walls were found in its various strata. While there is a slight resemblance between these and the famous pyramidal mounds of the Mayas and Azetcs of Mexico, archeologists have not been able to establish a definite cultural relationship between their civilizations.

Other mounds and the areas contiguous to them have yielded a diversified collection of artifacts and utensils identified with the aboriginal inhabitants of the country. The complete outlines of many of their houses, with hard-packed and polished clay floors, have been uncovered. Sections of clay-daubed reed wattles have been found to indicate then construction methods while a number of fire-burned storage pits, still holding in some cases an ancient family's winter corn supply, testify to their frugality. Their weapons, apparently, were stone clubs, and arming implements were fashioned from the larger bones of animals.

But by far the most interesting single discovery at the Macon works is a ceremonial chamber which has been recovered from the earth almost intact. Found under a small knoll not more than three feet high, the overburden of red clay was carefully stripped away with shovel and trowel. Soon a perfect circle of baked-clay walls, with a diameter of forty-two feet, showed in the carefully shaved profile. Two round, U-shaped buttresses marked the only break in the continuity of the ring and flanked the entrance corridor into the chamber. Further stripping revealed quantities of baked-clay briquettes and charred roof timbers, and as more debris was brushed away the complete floor plan began to appear.

From the complete evidence still remaining of this unusual structure, Dr. Kelly and his colleagues have been able to reconstruct an interesting picture of the original building itself. Just what was the meaning and purpose of this chamber and what strange rites were practiced there? Was there human sacrifice to some hierarchy of wild-visaged devil-gods, or was the worship addressed to a more beneficent sun diety? And what became of the builders of these mounds and temples? Did they fall victims to warlike invaders, allowing their civilization to perish and their race to be absorbed by another? For, admittedly, there is little evidence of racial kinship between them and the Greeks save that they lived in the same place.

Solution Coming in Fragments

These are only a few of the intriguing mysteries which Dr. Kelly and his associates are absorbed in unraveling. The solution is coming to them in fragments, but some of them even now can be pieced together to give a fairly coherent picture.

The area around Macon is now in process of being converted into a park to be known as the Ocmulgee National Monument, where these invaluable archeological structures will be preserved for all time.

A.S. Vernay Tells Of Trip To Tibet

Monk, Immured 12 Years, Put Covered Hand Out Of Cell Only To Take Food

Arthur S. Vernay returned to New York City on November 19 on the Cunard White Star liner Berengaria from a journey to Lhasa, Tibet, with Suydam Cutting on an expedition for the American Museum of Natural History, of which both are trustees. He said they had collected more than 250 specimens of rare plants, birds and reptiles from the region around Lhasa and the Himalayas, which they had crossed.

Mr. Vernay added that he had brought also several native costumes from Tibet, which later will be placed on exhibition in the museum, according to the New York Times.

"Tibet is a wonderful country to visit and the people are most hospitable if they like you, but if not they can be most cruel," Mr. Vernay said. "It took five years to get a permit to enter the country, and we got as far as Shiyatzi and then we were turned back. When we reached Calcutta on our way home an invitation came from the Council of Five that governs the country in the absence of the Regent that we could go to Lhasa.

Customs Never Change

"Then we turned back and traveled to Siliguri on the railroad and then by ponies, mules, yaks and on foot for the 625 miles to Lhasa via Gyangze. There is not a single cartwheel in Tibet and the country has not changed in 1,000 years, in its customs.

"Seven miles outside Gyangze we visited the Hermitage where a certain sect of Monks immure themselves for years at a time. During the period their only communication with the outside world is through a small square hole in the thick wooden walls of the cell.

"When the solitary occupant hears three knocks given with a stone on the wall he thrusts out a hand covered with a red cloth for food, but does not speak or see who it is that calls him The monk whose hand I saw had been twelve years in that cell, cut off from humanity. The monk who showed me around said that some day they will knock and there will be no answer. Then the door of the cell will be unlocked and the body will be taken out for burial."

Mr. Vernary said there were streets in Lhasa and some fine stone buildings. Of the 40,000 inhabitants in Lhasa about 18,000 are monks. There were 3,300 of them living in the monastery at Shiyatzi, he said.

Seek "Incarnate" Lama

The Regent was away from the capital looking for an "incarnate" to replace the Dalai Lama, who died Dec. 17, 1933.

"That was two years ago." Mr. Vernary continued, "and the Regent who is also 'incarnate' has to find the incarnate of the Dalai Lama in the body of a 2-year-old boy who will be known by marks on the hands and head. There is a clue that the child will be found near a lake and the Regent has gone in search of him."

Mr. Vernay said that the chief drink of the people in Tibet was butter tea, made of tea with slightly rancid yak butter, salt and soda.

"It is not so bad," he said, "and I have drunk eighteen cups of it at a sitting. The natives often drink forty or more.

"It is customary to take a white silk scarf when making a call upon one of the high lamas and leave it there with a considerable present in money. In return the Tibetan calls upon you with another white silk scarf and the present which usually consists of sheep, cases of eggs, mostly bad, and a barrel or two of yak butter."

Mr. Vernay said that on the way from Gyantzi to Lhasa he and Mr. Cutting crossed two passes, one 16,400 feet high and the other 16,000 feet. The highest pass on the way back to Calcutta from the capital was 17,450 feet. They made the journey in thirteen days.

Mrs. Vernay, who has been in Paris with Mrs. Cutting, came back on the Berengaria with her husband. Mr. Cutting will return on the Europa next week.

It would be of quite real and serious interest if a number of sample "hate" inquiries were to be held in different parts of the country, to discover whether any of these hates had a geographical significance, or a class or occupational significance, or an age or sex significance.

Tepid Majority

Quality of response to broadcast programs is every bit as important as quantity. The great danger of wireless is an easy middle way of giving and an easy middle way of receiving. The study of reactions to broadcasting has concerned itself mainly with the tepid majority reaction, because that has seemed numerically the most important.

Good haters, however, may prove to be among the B. B. C.'s most devoted listeners and most constructive critics, and to dissect their pet abominations might be a work not only of charity, but of profit.

Return of Grew and Kabayama Called Welcome Christmas Gift

No Christmas present could be more gratifying than the return of the American Ambassador, Mr. Joseph Clark, Grew, and Count Aisuke Kabayama, vice president of the America-Japan Society, declared Prince Iyesato Tokugawa at a welcome luncheon given by that society in their honor Thursday noon at the Tokyo Kaikan. The Ambassador had returned from a trip to the United States early this week and Count Kabayama had returned from the United States Friday of last week.

In introducing the speakers, Prince Tokugawa called Count Kabayama an international commuter, referred to his frequent trips to the United States and Europe, and concluded, "He never leaves any country without planting the seeds of better international understanding."

Ambassador Grew spoke of the entire change that has come to the United States in the last three years, declaring that pessimism has been routed by optimism, that everywhere things are on an uplift trend and that a happy, confident spirit prevails. He gave the audience a clear cut picture of President Roosevelt, saying:

"I made three separate visits to Washington and held ample opportunity to get in touch with the Adminstration which has come into office since may appointmnt to Japan. I saw the President several times and went over much ground with him. He seemed to be quite as familiar with the affairs of my post and its details as I am myself, and his clarity of vision, energy, enthusiasm, and utter cheerfulness and joy in his work filed me with admiration. After contact with such a Chief, one returns to one's duties with renewed vigor, and with the feeling that one's storage battery has been refilled and will last for some time to come."

Ambassador Grew also spoke of his contacts with the stage department which were highly valuable, adding that a great many subjects are made clearer through personal discussion than they ever could be in correspondence. Speaking of his conception of an Ambassador, he continued:

"His primary and fundamental purpose is not only to eliminate friction but to develop sound, sane and mutually beneficial relations of friendship and goodwill, both in principle and in practice, between his own country and the country to which he is accredited. He must therefore not only support and maintain the interests of his own country and people but must also at the same time set forth a fair and reasonable picture of the interests and point of view, and all that lies beneath them, of the other country and people. Otherwise the basis for those mutually beneficial relations will be only half laid, and there will exist the danger that the resulting edifice may be constructed on sand. And so it was not without some practical truth that I smilingly remarked to Ambassador Saito in Washington that I was temporarily usurping his functions by acting as Japanese representative to the United States. I am hopeful that in some respects these efforts will not have been in vain. On the other hand, I have learned much concerning the point of view of the American Government and people touching many questions, and in setting forth these points of view in Tokyo I confidently look for a sympathetic hearing and a continued endeavor to find a basis upon which Japanese-American relations may continue upon an even keel with a mutual and common sense comprehension and appreciation of both sides of the picture."

In his address, Count Kabayama termed the visit of the Garden club to Japan last spring second, from a social point of view, only to coming of Commodore Perry. He said everywhere he went, he heard mention of the visit, even in the places where there was no member of the garden club.

"The object of my visit abroad was primarily as a representative of the House of Peers at the Parliamentary Conference in London. There in that center of social, economic and political activities of Europe I had a wonderful chance to observe the mentality of the peoples of England and France and Italy, in regard to such question as the stabilization of the currency, opinion towards the war, the League of Nations, and other subjects. I feel that I have supplemented by education which was lacking in certain respects.

"After leaving London I went to the United States really on a mission of my own, to introduce the Society for Cultural Relations which was formed nearly two years ago, and to come into personal contact with people and groups interested in cultural activities in the United States. Part of the time I was with Baron and Baroness Dan. We visited Washington, New York, Boston, Chicago, and several other places.

"It was my intention to visit twelve cities, but my program during the 45 days I was in the country was so full, with engagements for breakfast, luncheon, dinner, for receptions and lectures, that in the end I could only visit six. But everywhere I went people seemed to be most interested in receiving news from Japan on subjects other than politics and military affairs. They wanted to know something of the best tradition of Japanese life, and it was in this spirit that I was everywhere greeted. On no occasion was I given an opportunity to entertain on my own account.

"It was wonderful to find out that every city from its very beginning, has paid the greatest attention to its cultural life and development. Each city seems to compete with others in this respect. Each one will tell you it has cultural features which are not to be found in any other city in America, and some will say any city in the world. American cities appear to be developing along the lines of the cities of Ancient Greece. I found it everywhere, and in Los Angeles it was the strongest.

"So I found no difficulty in asking for the cooperation of cultural bodies in America with our work in the International Cultural Society in Tokyo. But circumstances made me decide that our society, which has only been established about two years, is not quite ready to embark on any extensive cultural development as yet. Much would be expected of us, and although anticipation is a good thing, it would be a pity not to come up to expectations, and it was with that in mind that I decided to curtail my programme and visit only six cities. As it is I have just established enough personal contacts with the president or heads of ten or eleven universities and cultural institutions in the places I visited, and we will now be able to cooperate with them. This Japan-America society will be asked to become the real liaison organ in the advance of the cultural work.

"I would like to stress what Mr. Grew has said as to the attitude of the American people towards the east. I was in the United States shortly after the occurrence of the Manchuria Incident, and on this recent visit I noticed that an enormous change has come about.

"During my stay in American I had the opportunity of long confidential talks with many prominent men—Mr. Castle, Mr. Norman Davis, Colonel House, Mr. Taft, President Butler, President Lowell, Mr. Forbes, and many others—and what they told me bears out what Mr. Grew also has said just now. So I have returned with a very optimistic feeling.

Among the guests at the speakers' table were Mrs. Grew, the American Charge d'Affaires and Mrs. Neville, former Ambassador to the United States, Mr. Debuchi, and Mrs. Cecil Lyon, daughter of Ambassador and Mrs. Grew.

Northern Rhodesia Has Resplendent Capital City

features, the avoidance of that chequer-board design which makes so many modern cities dull and unsightly, and the provision of entirely separate areas for the different activities of the town. The residential quarter, the trading and business areas, the African town and the sports grounds, are set apart from each other.

Residential Plans

The residential quarter is laid out along the north side of the ridge. the crest and the southern slope of the ridge are occupied by offices, while the flat country between the ridge and the railway is devoted to shops and factory sites and, on the south, to the African town. Thus every section of the community seems likely to get what it wants.

As for the African, he has a self-contained town and will be near the shops and the siteema (steamer, i. e. the train) and, since he appreciates shops and railway engines more than the loveliest of views, he will be well content.

The airport has been designed on an elaborate scale since it will be not only the center for the air traffic of the country itself, but will also be the principal port of call within Northern Rhodesia on the Imperial Airways route from London to Cape Town and on any route which may develop across this part of Africa from the Atlantic to the Indian Ocean.

Jersey City Bird Houses Will Cost WPA $1,733

Construction of several hundred bird houses in Jersey City parks is among the projects on the Spring program of the WPA in Hudson County, New Jersey, F. Walter Brannagan, country director of the WPA, learned on November 27 the project, to cost $1,733 and scheduled to employ about fifty carpenters and other craftsmen, had been approved in Washington.

It had been suggested by Hugh C. Clarke, city planning engineer of Jersey City. The work will be done in the shops of the Department of Parks and Public Property, according to the New York Times. M Brannagan announced that of the 30,000 relief clients in Hudson County, all but 7,500 who are regarded as unemployable had been transferred from relief to WPA projects.

Whether a similar arrangement has been made with Ethiopia it is impossible to say.

Italians' Claim

Italian interests, on the other hand, are chiefly based on a forward policy with regard to Ethiopia, which dates from the time when Italy first set foot on that part of the Red Sea coast which has now become Eritrea. Ever since the days of Francesco Crispi the Italians have had ambitious design in North East Africa, which were intensified by the occupation of Tripoli and the acquisition of Italian Somaliland. As Ethiopia is situated between Eritrea and Italian Somaliland, there has long been a desire to link up these two colonies by means of a railway through Ethiopian territory, and the Italians have regarded their influence as their lawful right.

As the result of a treaty negotiated between Great Britain, France and Italy in 1906 the three powers, amongst other things, reached an understanding dividing Ethiopia into three "zones of influence," in each of which it was recognized that one or other had preponderating interests. As far as Italy was concerned the chief object in view was to safeguard Italian interests in connection with Eritrea and Italian Somaliland, more especially in regard to their hinterland and their territorial junction to the west of Addis Ababa. This, however, is only one of several agreements in which Italian influence in Ethiopia has been duly recognized.

Danger From Border Raids

Another important aspect of the matter is the protection of Eritrea and Italian Somaliland from aggression in the form of armed raids over the frontier, which, according to the Italian claim, have made Ethiopia, where the majority of the population are armed, a constant source of danger to the Italian colonies. Italian influence has therefore been partly of a forward nature and partly defensive in character.

On the economic side, France and Italy are the only countries whose commercial activity has led to definite influence in Ethiopia. The French railway, together with commercial undertakings and the fact that many public institutions are in French hands, has given the French a certain hold over the Ethiopian Government. The Italians, on the other hand, besides owning concessions of various kinds, have their own wireless station, and have been responsible for the carrying out of certain public works, their skill in engineering being of special value to a country such as Ethiopia. Ordinary trade, however, is chiefly in the hands of Greeks, Armenians and Levantines.

Japanese Issue

Another question of considerable interest is that of Japanese interests with regard to the country, about which there seems to be a great deal of misunderstanding.

Before leaving London I was under the impression that the Japanese had a large cotton concession in Ethiopia, and had established themselves politically as well as commercially. After investigation, however, I found that the Japanese community in Ethiopia consisted of approximately two men and one woman, who carried on a trade of Japanese cotton goods in Addis Ababa! Yet the situation is not so farcical as it appears. The facts are that Japanese policy is to extend political and commercial influence among the colored races of Africa, with a view to gradually securing an increasing degree of control, and Japan has decided that commercial influence should be the forerunner of political moves.

In the case of Ethiopia the Japanese Government began several years ago by sending a small mission of experts to travel through the country and to carefully study the prospects for Japanese commerce. After a most thorough and exhaustive investigation, this mission submitted a report to Tokyo on which the Government will act when they consider the time is appropriate.

Promoting Cotton Goods

Meantime, the Japanese know exactly the value of Ethiopia from their commercial point of view, and are quietly distributing their cotton goods throughout the country as a preliminary to more intensive action. It is, therefore, at present on commercial grounds that Japan favors Ethiopia in her conflict with Italy, and it is significant that the Japanese Government have decided to open a Legation at Addis Ababa at the end of this year.

The Ethiopian Government have also signed contracts with Japan for important consignments of arms and ammunition, and there has been talk of a visit to Ethiopia by a Japanese military and commercial mission.

As the Emperor prefers to choose his advisers from countries with little or no interest in Ethiopia these officials are of a miscellaneous nationality. While the training of the army in general is in the hands of Belgian officers, there is a school of instruction for Ethiopian cadets under Swedish supervision, and a French officer is in charge of military aviation. In the Foreign Ministry, advice has, until recently, been given by a Swedish General, and in matters of finance the Emperor has had the advice of an American expert. The services of Swiss advisers are also employed, while a Greek doctor acts as personal adviser to the Emperor. There is also talk of a retired British Colonel being added to the number of foreign counselors.

Sets Billion More As Limit Of 'Dole'

the 3,500,000 would be absorbed by private industry before the $4,000,000,000 was exhausted. He said that if private industry did not play an appropriate part, by absorbing the best part of the 3,500,000, the problem would be most difficult.

"I am in favor of cutting off direct relief," he said. "I think that industry during the next six months should be able to absorb the greater part of those on the relief rolls. The country was carrying regularly 3,500,000 to 5,000,000 unemployed before the depression and this can be done again.

"They talk of a convulsion when relief is stopped. The sooner we have it and get it over with, the better for the country. That is what happens when the government goes into relief."

Mr. Bucanan said that his information was that only $478,000,000 of the $4,000,000,000 actually has been spent, although most of the huge sum has been allocated. No one, he added, knew how long the money would last.

Will Cut as Much as Possible

His committee, he stated, had no authority to withdraw any part of the $4,000,000,000. In this connection, he indicated that he was not enthusiastic over a good deal of the government relief program, and said that if Congress found worthwhile plans for which to appropriate funds, this should be done.

Mr. Buchanan said he had not come to any conclusion with President Roosevelt whether both the regular and emergency budgets would be reduced.

"I am going to cut all I can," he added significantly.

The chairman's general idea is to make the ordinary budget balance. Discussing the bonus, he put forward the suggestion that "baby bonds" might be used to finance the operation, thus avoiding a cash outlay.

The figures used by Acting Budget Director Bell at the Warm Springs conference were "tentative," Mr. Buchanan stated. He added that "if they are going to stick to that," there was no reason for him to confer there. He said he had urged the President to reduce the totals and hoped the Executive would do so.

Child Weavers Give Persian Rug To ILO

The successful efforts made in the last twelve years by the International Labor Office to improve conditions for Iranian child rug weavers brought it recently an unusually valuable Khorassan rug.

The Iranian Minister to Geneva, Sayed Mustapha Adle, who presented the gift to Harold Butler, director of the office, reminded him that intervention by the office led the government in 1923 to promulgate a law for the protection of these children, and he added:

"These little artisans of my country are happy today to have their prodigiously skilful and diligent fingers interpret their gratitude to the institution that wished to aid them."

The International Labor Office had called attention to the fact that rugs were being made by young boys and girls who toiled for unending hours, without holidays and in bad sanitary conditions, according to the New York Times. The law that resulted established the eight-hour day, forbade employment of boys younger than 8 years old and girls younger than 10 and required healthier working conditions.

PRIEST IS KILLED

News has just reached here of the death in Shensi of Father Paul Hou at the hands of Communists.

Father Hou met his death while defending his Christians against a Red attack. He was killed by a hand grenade.

The village of Tungtsuen held out against repeated attacks by Reds and finally they gathered extra forces for a sixth attack on the village. Father Hou threw in his lot with his flock and at their request directed the defence of the village. He was firing at the Reds from the top of the village wall when a hand grenade exploded near him.

CHRISTMAS AT HOSPITAL

Santa Claus visited the babies and small children who are confined to St. Luke's hospital, early Wednesday morning, scattering toys and cheer as he ran from bed to bed. A beautifully decorated Christmas tree brightens the children's ward and a miniature manger scene stands at the entrance to the ward. With the children playing with their new gifts and with the Christmas decorations everywhere, the ward looks more like a setting for a children's party than a hospital these days.

Aide Of Goebbels Ousted For Graft

Berlin Propaganda Bureau Chief Faces Trial For Fiscal Irregularities

From official sources in Berlin it was learned on Nov. 26 that Walther Schulze, better known as Schulze Wechsungen, director of the provincial office for Berlin, Brandenburgh and Kurmark of the Propaganda Ministry, had been relieved of all his duties on account of financial irregularities and that he faced trial. The irregularities are said to have to do with the administration of his bureau.

Rumors that Mr. Schulze had shot himself dead in Moabit prison were officially denied, according to Frederick T. Birchall in the New York Times. He was said to be alive and at liberty.

The important position in party councils that he had occupied is scarcely indicated by Mr. Schulze's official title. He was a member of the Reichstag and lecturer at the high school for politics. He specialized in national Socialist ideology.

Although the information regarding what has happened to him is official, it has not been and probably will not be published in Germany.

Other Scandals Rumored

It is further reported that similar charges against another official high in party councils is being investigated, but this is thus far without official confirmation.

There is still a further report, which quite naturally cannot be confirmed, that no less a personage than Dr. Hjalmar Schacht, the Economics Minister has become greatly concerned by irregularities in party circles that have come to his attention and has appealed directly to Chancellor Adolf Hitler to have something done about them, with what result the report does not disclose. It is well known, however, that allegations of corruption within the Nazi party are becoming serious.

Cases of extortion by party members from Jews are published repeatedly as warning to others, and newspapers have recorded one arrest for this cause. Many other arrests are known to have been made, but they have not been published.

This, however, can scarcely be surprising, in view of the new system and se-tur under national socialism. Members of the Nazi party are amenable only to party discipline and are immune from prosecution unless turned over to the criminal courts by the party.

Nazi Chiefs Are Potentates

Local leaders are little potentates in their own domains, answerable only to higher party chieftains, who are busy enough with their own concerns. No one else can exercise any power without their sanction, and no one else can interfere with them.

From time to time there are house-cleanings in certain Nazi circles, but with the outcome strictly withheld from public view. There was one such last August, when Franz Eckhardt, district head of the Association of German Stage Members, a subsidiary of the Reich Theater Chamber, which in turn is an offshoot of the Propaganda Ministry, was accused of financial irregularities. The case against him was turned over to the public prosecutor by the Propaganda Ministry. Nothing, however, has since been heard of it.

Simultaneously Dr. Otto Leers, a member of the presiding council of the Reich Theater Chamber, was removed from all his offices on the initiative of Propaganda Minister Joseph Goebbels. But nothing more has been heard of his case, either, after the first announcement, which was issued as a warning.

Whether now there is to be a general clean-up with the public informed of the result is not known, but it may be considered greatly in doubt.

Packers Vanquish Pirates, 34 to 14

N. Y. Times

PITTSBURGH, Nov. 24—Pittsburgh's Pirates were eliminated today from the National Football League championship race as they bowed to the ponderous Green Bay Packers, 34 to 14.

The victory, punctuated by numerous spectacular plays and the hurling of a pop bottle at Umpire Robb, gave Green Bay seven triumphs in ten games and practically assured it of the Western divisional honors.

George Sauer, former Nebraska back-field star, made the best of the running plays that thrilled the 12,900 spectators when he intercepted a pass and galloped 75 yards for a touchdown in the second period.

Umpire Robb called two Packer passes complete a few minutes later because of interference, drawing a chorus of boos and the pop bottle, which fell far short of its mark.

The two passes aided an 80-yard touchdown push for Green Bay, with Johnny Blood going over the goal line after taking a pass from Bob Monnett. The initial Packer touchdown came in the first period after a 50-yard drive, Sauer cutting through right tackle for the final 3 yards.

Little Jim Levey scored the Pittsburgh touchdowns, one on a lateral and the other on a forward.

The line-up:

Pos.	Green Bay (34)	Pittsburgh (14)
L.E.	Rose	Vidoni
L.G.	Michalske	Arndt
C.	Svendsen	Ciccone
R.G.	Evans	Hoel
R.T.	Schwammel	Niccolai
R.E.	Hubbard	Sortet
Q.B.	Goldenberg	Turley
L.H.	Herber	Gildea
R.H.	Sauer	Strutt
F.B.	Hinkle	Wetzel

SCORE BY PERIODS

Green Bay	6	14	0	14	—34

Dr. Fujii's Gold Needle Will Cure Organic Troubles

Miraculous healing claims are made for a gold needle invented by a Japanese doctor, Dr. Momotaro Fujii.

He claims that his small gold needle is the only means of permanently curing organic troubles without medicine, without traces, without reaction.

Dr. Fujii has among his patients wives of prominent foreigners in Tokyo, many of whom came in a skeptic frame of mind but have remained to cheer for the doctor and his needle.

Dr. Fujii speaking to the press, declared that the essense of his treatment lies in stimulating the nervous system and restoring a relaxed condition of the nerves. He considers that nervous disorder is the cause of headaches, neuraglia, stomach trouble, and a score of other complaints.

He claims that a month of treatment from his needle will cure an acute disease, from two to three months treatment will cure chronic ailments. He claims, further, that the needle is effective in treating sprained ankles and wrists and in finishing off" an operation.

The treatment consists of pushing the needle into the skin at the centers of the nervous system or—in case of headache—all over the head and neck. The treatment is not painful, according to all who have taken it. A treatment takes but a few minutes.

The Fujii Physio-Therapeutical Institute has been established to teach the use of the instrument. Among those who recently finished the course given by the institute were Mme. Hugo Hergel, the wife of the Danish Charge d'Affaires and Mme. Jean Baptiste Barbier, wife of the secretary of the French Embassy. Diplomas were given them in the presence of H. E. the Polish Minister and Mme. M. Moscicki on Dec. 10.

Roosevelt Proud To See Work Done For Progress

tion that by some time in November of this year we would substantially end the dole and offer in place of it employment to by far the greater part of the 3,500,000 employable persons we estimated to be on the relief rolls in the United States.

Week after week since then some individuals and some groups, careless of the truth and regardless of scruple, have sought to make the American people believe that this program was a hopeless failure and that it could not possibly succeed.

Today is the twenty-ninth day of November. It gives me a certain satisfaction to be able to inform you, and through you the nation, that on Wednesday, two days ago, there were 3,125,000 persons at work on various useful projects throughout the nation. The small remaining number have received orders to report to work on project already under way or ready to be started. This result, I believe you will agree with me, constitutes a substantial and successful national achievement.

Sees Practical Side of Slum Clearance

Aside from the tremendous increase in morale through substituting work for a dole, there is the practical side of permanent material benefit. Within sight of us today stands a tribute to useful work under government supervision, the first slum clearance and low rent housing project.

Here, at the request of the citizens of Atlanta, we have cleaned out nine square blocks of antiquated, squalid dwellings, for years a detriment to this community. Today those hopeless old houses are gone and in their place we see the bright, cheerful buildings of the Techwood housing project. Within a very short time, people who never before could get a decent roof over their heads will live here in reasonable, comfortable, healthful, worthwhile surroundings. Others will find similar homes in Atlanta's second slum clearance, the University project; and still others will find similar opportunty in nearly all of the older, overcrowded cities of the United States.

I take it that it has been equally worthwhile to the nation to give jobs to the unemployed in the construction of a vast network of highways, including thousands of miles of farm to market roads; in repairing great numbers of schools and building hundreds of new ones in city and country, in helping cities to put in sewers and sewage disposal plants and water-works, in constructing cold storage warehouses and county recreational buildings, in creating aviation fields, in giving a million boys a chance to go to CCC camps and to work on forestry and on soil-erosion prevention, in controlling malaria, in pushing health projects, in putting white-collar workers into jobs of permanent usefulness to their communities, and in giving youth an opportunity for better education.

Replies to Bankers Who Criticize Debt

Into the ears of many of you has been dinned the cry that your government is piling up an unconscionable and back-breaking debt. Let me tell you a simple story:

In the Spring of 1933 many of the great bankers of the United States flocked to Washington. They were there to get help of their government in the saving of their banks from insolvency. To them I pointed out, in all fairness, the simple fact that the government would be compelled to go heavily into debt for a few years to come in order to save bank and insurance companies and mortgage companies, and railroads, and to take care of millions of people who were on the verge of starvation.

Every one of these gentlemen expressed to me the firm conviction that it was all well worth the price and that they heartily approved.

In order to get their further judgment, however, I asked them what they thought the maximum national debt of the United States Government could rise to without serious danger to the national credit. Their answers—remember this was in the Spring of 1933—were that the country could safely stand a national debt of between fifty-five and seventy billion dollars.

I told them that a rise in the national debt to any such figure was, in my judgment, wholly unnecessary, and that even if they, the bankers, were willing I could not and would not go along with them. I told them then that only a moderate increase in the debt for the next few years seemed likely and justified. That objective holds good today; but remember that at that time many bankers and big business men would have been willing to put the country far deeper into debt than I shall ever let it go.

Can Invest Way Into Sound Future

If the bankers thought the country could stand a debt of fifty-five to seventy billion dollars in 1933, with values as they were then, I wonder what they would say the country could stand today, in the light of an enormous increase of values of property of all kinds all along the line since 1933.

Your government says to you: "You cannot borrow your way out of debt; but you can invest your way into a sounder future."

As a matter of actual fact, of course, the gross national debt under the last administration rose from a little over seventeen billions to twenty-one billions. The day I came into office I found that the national Treasury contained only $158,000,000, or, at the rate of previously authorized expenditures, enough to last the Treasury less than a month.

Since March 4, 1933, the national debt has risen from 21 billions to 29½ billions, but it must also be remembered that today, included in this figure is nearly 1½ billions of working balance in the Treasury and nearly 4½ billion dollars of recoverable assets which the government will get back over a period of years, and which will be used for the retirement of debt.

As things stand today, and in the light of a definite and continuing economic improvement, we have passed the peak of appropriations. Revenues without the imposition of new taxes are increasing and we can look forward with assurance to a decreasing deficit. The credit of the government is today higher than that of any other great nation in the world, in spite of attacks on that credit made by those few individuals and organizations which seek to dictate to the administration and to the Congress how to run the national Treasury and how to let the needy starve.

Nation Out of Red Through Rise In Values

In the Spring of 1933, if you and I had made a national balance sheet, we would have found that if we had added up the values of all of the property of every kind in the United States owned by American citizens, the total of these values, which we would call assets, would have been exceeded by the figure representing the total of all the debts owed by the people of the United States. In other words, at that time our national balance sheet, the wealth versus the debts of the American public, showed that we were in the red.

Today, less than three years later, it is a fact that the total of all the debts in the United States is lower than it was then. Whereas on the other side of the picture, you and I know that the values of property of all kinds—farms, houses, automobiles, securities and every other kind of property—have increased so greatly since 1933 that today we are once more in the black. We were insolvent: today we are solvent.

In this fact more of us find a deep satisfaction. But recovery means something more than getting the country back into the black. You and I do not want just to go back to the past. We want face the future in the belief that human beings can enjoy more of the good things of life, under better conditions, than human beings ever enjoyed in the past.

American life has improved in these two years and a half, and if I have anything to do with it, it is going to improve more in the days to come. The word "progress" is a better word than "recovery," for it means not only a sound business and a sound agriculture from the material point of view, but it means, with equal importance, a sound improvement in American life as a result of continuing and forceful effort on the part of our people and, through them, on the part of their government.

I am certain that that is your purpose; and that is why I continue my confidence, my faith, in the people of America.

Former Tin Dictator On Trial In London

John Howeson, one-time dictator of the world's tin industry, was among three business men who appeared at the Mansion House Court in London, England on Nov. 26 on criminal charges arising from the pepper crash of last Winter.

It was charged Mr. Howeson, with Louis Hardy and Garabed Bishiroian, "did make, circulate, publish or concur in so doing a prospectus he knew to be false in material particulars with intent to induce persons to become shareholders in a company."

A similar charge several years ago resulted in the conviction and a year in prison for Lord Kylsant, former head of the gigantic Royal Mail shipping combine, says the New York Times.

In the tiny court room, crowded with business men, the prosecutor, Eustace Fulton, reviewed the history of the pepper case, which shook the commodity markets of London last February and caused losses of more than £1,000,000. He described the process whereby Williams Henry & Co., with existing commitments of £600,000 in pepper and shellac, was suddenly turned last year into a new public company called James & Shakspeare, Ltd.

"It is suggested that the defendants used the money obtained from public shares in order to finance their shellac position," the prosecutor declared. "No records of these commitments were shown to accountants who drew up the prospectus. The evidence shows clearly that the position was concealed from the public in order to meet obligations."

The hearing then adjourned and was to be resumed on Dec. 11.

Tomb of Will Adams and his Wife.

'Dr. Scherer's presentation of "Miura Anjin" as a Japanese samurai is thrilling, and his portraiture of that bygone time has the ring of truth. His romance is real history, and I find it far superior to any historical novel of recent years. For he knows the Old Japan at first hand, and has absorbed its atmosphere. He is as much at home on the straw-mats of Nihon as in the Mermaid Tavern: and he transports his reader with him.'—Dr. Thomas Baty in The Japan Times.

Interest In Ethiopia Has Bared Conditions

gave a performance, the audience responded with a hearty laugh. A good analogy may be found in the Ethiopian broadcasting. Its false announcements no longer sound convincing even to the local populace, while the rest of the world is no more than amused by them.

Liberation of Slaves

Addis Ababa, by wireless and telegraph, announces that the Italians could not possibly have liberated 16,000 slaves, because there were not so many in the Tigre. Here is a confirmation, or shall we say "an official confirmation" of the existence of slavery on a huge scale in Ethiopia, slavery which the Negus had bound himself to abolish, but which was actually maintained, to be finally abolished by the Italians. Addis Ababa tries to garble the truth with figures. But Ethiopia has never had a census. On the other hand Italy can produce numbered and indicative files, and each liberated slave is provided with a passport of emancipation. This surely redounds to the credit of Italy and her civilizing mission, despite the tables of a Pact, which, interpreted crassly, would cause slavery to flourish unhindered and even sanctioned.

Addis Ababa has even gone to the extent of broadcasting fatuous stories concerning the rape of coptic nuns by Italian soldiers—soldiers who regularly share their rations with the starving natives. Now it is a well known fact that these nuns are all elderly women, generally well over fifty years of age. Furthermore, there is only one convent in all Tigre, which, of its own volition, sent a friendly delegation to the Italian authorities and was accorded benevolent protection.

Colonial Administration

The Negus, evidently illuding himself that humanity in general does not exceed his own untutored Ethiopians in intelligence, had the temerity, only recently, to state in an interview with an American journalist, that Italy is not enfitled to call herself a colonizing power, "as is evidenced by the state in which she has left her colonies." Could anything more grotesque be imagined? Hundreds of foreign journalists—French, German, English, Polish, Czechoslovak, American—have sung the praises of Italy for the magnificent way in which she has promoted progress and civilization in the colonies under her administration.

The Negus has travelled for days on his little mule and under his umbrella, across the desolate wastes of his now tottering empire. He could, if he would, travel for days over perfect roads through gardens of fruits and olives—results of the productive labour of a civilized people, who have wiped out in those regions the horrible curse of slavery.

But the world can judge for itself, and that should suffice.

Many Fine Carols Made About 1,400

pect of our casual ways in the preservation of popular vocal music. Fortunately, there has been of late a revival of carol-writing. During the last few weeks I have encountered many admirable examples by Peter Warlock, Alec Rowley, B. J. Dale and others.

Warlock wrote many carols and have not yet encountered one which is not worthy of the tradition. Each of his is original; each is simple. They require a good ear and a good memory for proper performance. They are written in such a way that slovenly singing is precluded. One false interval and the thread is irreparable broken. From this composer's list two have especially won my affection—"The First Mercy," a setting of words by Bruce Blunt, and "Carillon," "Carilla," a setting of Hilaire Belloc's poem for unison or mixed voices.

So, discounting the period of versions and perversions, English carols, ancient, middle-aged, and modern, make an impressive collection. And our organized carol-singing is no less impressive. Admirable performances are given by such bodies as the Oriana Madrigal Society, the Royal Choral Society, the Westminster Abbey Special Choir and the societies in every part of the country that give carol concerts at this time of the year.

Last year a visitor from Germany asked me where he could hear a good carol service in England. I invited him to accompany me to Southwark Cathedral for the annual Procession of Carols there. He said afterwards that it was one of the most moving experiences that had come his way during a six months' stay in this country.

Most of our cathedrals provide a carol service where visitors can hear the best of English carols sung in a manner that is in keeping with the worthiest tradition of English church music. At Norwich Cathedral, for example, a service of carols and organ music is given every year a few days after Christmas. The event is well worth a journey from London. The singing is more austere than in the northern cathedrals and the music is always chosen with taste. Last year I heard there a number of lovely carols, including Gustav Holst's "Lullaby my liking," the "Coventry Carol," Armstrong Gibbs's "Craddle Song," the fifteenth century "To us is born" and Dr. Charles Wood's arrangement of the enchanting "King Jesus hath a garden."

Anglican church music is in its fullest flower at this season of the year. Let the musical reader pay a visit to any of our cathedrals during the days following Christmas and he will realize the unique quality and strength of the tradition.

Liberalization Of Teaching Of English Sought

American Teachers Agree There Shall Be Less Emphasis On Grammar Drills

School experiences will be made more lifelike for boys and girls and there will be less emphasis on text and grammar drills in the future as a result of the discussion at the twenty-fifth annual meeting of the National Council of English Teachers at Indianapolis, Indiana, according to the Christian Science Monitor.

The 1900 delegates from all states and England attending the convention sought not only the liberalization of English teaching but also fewer restrictions upon teachers themselves. Striking at the loyalty of this proposed by legislative action and the furore over teaching subversive topics, the convention adopted two resolutions. They were:

"We deplore class legislation and social attitudes which would single out teachers as a professional group and subject them to special restrictions are regulations which do not apply with equal force to all citizens."

Teachers Assert Loyalty

The teachers asserted their loyalty to American institutions and declared that their patriotism is undiminished or never has been questioned. They pledged "opposition to forces which would restrict freedom of the teachers to teach the truth and thereby render the greatest possible service."

In keeping with the liberal trend of the convention regarding teaching of English, Dr. Dora V. Smith of the University of Minnesota was elected president of the council to succeed Prof. Charles Swain Thomas of Harvard University.

Speakers expressed the thought that English teachers in equipping youth to meet the battles of life should convey to them a picture of war and peace in their actual relations. A resolution that would have committed the council to stand for stricter neutrality of this country and strike at the militarization of American high schools and colleges through expansion of the Reserve Officers Training Corps was ordered placed in the hands of a study committee which the new president will select.

Dr. Smith said the resolution was too general in its terms and will be redrafted, published in the English journal and presented at the next convention to be held in Boston, Mass., Nov. 26, 1936.

Efforts of the teachers to depart from set ways of English teaching such as grammar drills were summed up in a discussion of the model curriculum evolved by the council's committee of 100 which Prof. W. Wilbur Hatfield, Chicago Normal College, led. This model curriculum now used throughout the United States, makes social experience the dominant factor in English teaching. havior text provides steps of equal Professor Hatfield said that this behavior text provides steps of equal heights between kindergartern and college for teaching English without division between grades.

Less Stress on Book "Larnin"

In it, less emphasis is placed on the textbook and more on outside reference; grammar is subordinated as a means to an end rather than an end in itself, and experiences of the pupil, teacher and others are drawn upon to create a greater appreciation of literature and speech. Language becomes a living thing and the student is better prepared to fit into his environment after graduation, it was stated. No opposition to the curriculum developed in the general discussion.

Professor Thomas, retiring president, was elected to a three-year term on the executive committee succeediing Stella Center of New York. Other officers elected were: Max J. Herberg, N. J., first vice-president; Ward H. Green, Tulsa, Okla., second vice-president. Professor Hatfield of Chicago was re-elected secretary-treasurer for his fifteenth consecutive term.

Keeping Abreast of World

Teachers should maintain a sensitive and intelligent response to the changing ideas of the world, Professor Thomas, the retiring president, told members of the council in the opening address of the session.

"Language is not merely an instrument for the expression of ideas but an instrument for the generation, development and crystallization of ideas.

"We should develop in students an attitude of genuine respect for the English language. Too many pupils accept the vernacular as a mere matter of course. They know too little of the history and genius; they care too little for the rhythm, its vigor, the adaptability for varying situations in imagined or realistic living.

"We have not yet succeeded in creating among Americans that high reverence for our language which the English feel for their English and the French for their French. Most of our boys and girls hesitate to express their ideas in the choice manner; they fear the withering glances and taunts of classmates."

Removal Of Coconut Oil Tax Demanded In U.S.

Guffey-Dockweiler Bill has been introduced in Congress and active measures are to be taken to support it at the next session, it was said here. This proposal would lift the excise tax from Philippine coconut oil that enters industrial channels but would continue it upon such oils as are used for edible products. In effect, Mr. Baker explained, this represents a compromise with proponents of the tax and will be favorable to copra producers as well The long-term price level for coconut oil, it was stressed, is set by industrial demand.

Still another problem which has been served up by the excise tax was seen in the provision for disposing of revenues collected under the act These were to have been remitted to the Philippine treasury so long as no bounty was paid to copra producers but so far the funds have been tied up in Washington upon the suspicion that such a disposition of American taxes was unconstitutional.

According to the Bureau of Raw Materials for American Vegetable Oils and Fats Industries, collections by the Bureau of Internal Revenue on the coconut oil excise tax for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1935, were $17,142,472.

"Congress did not contemplate that the consumers of the United States would pay the 3 cent per pound excise tax on Philippine coconut oil," John B. Gordon, secretary of the bureau, said in an analysis of the situation. "Otherwise it would not have provided that proceeds of the tax be remitted to the Philippine treasury.

"Actually, American consumers now pay a part if the tax, but the bulk of it has been passed back to the Philippine coconut growers. Ultimately they will have to absorb it all.

"At the moment of levying the tax it was obvious that the attempt was unfair, because no change was made in the policy which forces the Filipinos to accept our merchandise duty free. It has created a situation which threatens the economic and political stability of the new Philippine Commonwealth."

Rome Is Uneasy Over War Costs

ing the possibility to expand their economic life. It is quite possible that their effort has not been very diplomatic, inasmuch as they have broken the Kellogg pact. But they had seen other people—the Japanese, for example—break it without being punished.

Little by little the knot of sanctions is tightening around Italy. She is fighting with surprising dignity and courage. It is moving to see simple Italian people bring their dearest personal belongings to the country which they consider being unjustly attacked. Yet they hardly realize what the future will be for them and what hardships await them.

The East African war is being carried out on a rich scale such as Italy hardly can afford. This was not Premier Benito Mussolini's original plan, but he had to send more troops to East Africa when he saw that Great Britain was behind Ethiopia.

Sanctions Taking Effect

Besides the war costs, the sanctions are impoverishing the country rapidly. If it is true that Great Britain's aim in opposing the Ethiopian campaign was to humiliate and ruin Italy economically, this aim is being attained swiftly. Not only are the Bank of Italy's resources quickly being depleted, but individual wealth is melting. Trade is slowed by the sanctions and general uneasiness. The tourist industry, so important for Italy, is being crushed by the sanctions. The state is more and more gaining control of private profits and interests.

So far the Fascist regime, instead of being weakened by the crisis, is gaining strength. Theh Italian people have gathered about Premier Mussolini in a feeling of patrioitism urged on by foreign pressure. But what will be the future if the government is forced by this pressure to halt the Ethiopian campaign? The possibility of an armed outbreak in Europe still remains, since a nation in despair is capable of any unreasonable act.

Welsh Statesman Flays Government

contributed to the wellbeing, the efficiency, and the prosperity of the country? The maintenance allowances were not sufficient, judged by any standard, to provide all that life required for sustenance. The sums spent in doles, or devoted to useful tasks, would bring wages to hungry households and would transform the country. The Government had turned a deaf ear to all appeals made to them, and had preferred rather to increase the dole than to provide work.

References to work in their manifesto were vague and sketchy. They had no clearly thought out program or policy. After four years of doing nothing we were to have another four years of doing little. To cure any ill there must be an effective remedy. Anything short of that aggravated the ill and was a waste of effort.

Directing attention to the schemes which he had put forward, Mr. Lloyd George referred to the need for new roads, the provision of which and necessary materials offered plenty of work for hundreds of thousands. There were hundreds of thousands of acres of water-logged land which ought to be drained and utilized to raise more and fresher food on our soil. There were millions of acres of land which had fallen out of cultivation, more particularly in recent years, owing to lack of capital. This land ought to be reconditioned.

Farm buildings throughout the country were falling into disrepair owing to lack of capital. New buildings ought to be set up to meet modern scientific requirements for the production of milk, meat, and poultry, and also for storage.

If those tasks were undertaken and our marketing system organized, there was work for scores, if not reconstruction, and afterwards for hundreds of thousands in the initial increased labor on the soil.

Then there were the need for cheaper electricity, the utilization of our canals, the building of more schools, the provision of more open spaces in our towns. Who could say that any of these things were not practicable?

The Government now at last said that they were going to do something for the black-coated man out of work. As usual, they were doing the wrong thing, or doing the right thing too late

E.S. Judd Dies; Head Surgeon Of Mayo Clinic

Former American Medical Association President Pneumonia Victim At 57

Dr. Edward Starr Judd, chief of the surgical staff of Mayo Clinic, Rochester, Minn., and a former president of the American Medical Association, died of pneumonia in Chicago on November 30 at Presbyterian Hospital. He was fifty-seven years old.

Dr. Judd was suffering from a cold when he arrived at Chicago with his wife on the Monday previous en route to visit his daughters, Helen and Mary Jane Judd, undergraduates at Sweetbriar College, Lynchburg, Va.

With him when he died were a son, Edward Starr Judd jr., a graduate of Dartmouth College and now a student at Rush Medical College, the University of Chicago, and a brother, Cornelius Judd. Funeral services and burial were held at Rochester.

It was Dr. Judd's belief that the individual relationship between physician and patient was and would continue to be the crux of medical practice. Knowledge of the fundamentals if medicine would bring better treatment, he held. He listed the four outstanding health problems as heart disease, with its associated conditions, cancer, pneumonia and mental illness.

Dr. Judd was born July 11, 1878, at Rochester, Minn., a son of Edward F. and Emma J. Judd. He was graduated from the Medical School of the University of Minnesota in 1902. After an interneship in St. Mary's Hospital of the Mayo Clinic he was made first assistant to Dr. Charles H. Mayo in 1903. A year later he was appointed head of one of the sections of the clinic's divisions of surgery.

In 1908 Dr. Judd married Miss Helen Berkman, of Rochester a niece of the Mayo brothers. During the World War he was major in the Medical Officers' Reserve Corps of the United States Army and director of its school of instruction at Rochester.

Called "Surgeon's Surgeon"

The medical profession looked on Dr. Judd as one of the world's most skilled practitioners of abnormal surgery. He was known as "a surgeon's surgeon" because many doctors came to him for operations on themselves. His practice and study were centered about the Mayo Clinic at Rochester. Dr. William Mayo once called him the most skillful surgeon in the world.

As president of the American Medical Association in 1932, Dr. Judd spoke hopefully of a cure for cancer because of its inception as a single focus disease. Pointing out at that time that the medical profession had helped increase the life span of man from an average of thirty-three years in 1800 to 58.1 years in 1924, he predicted last May that the present rate to increase in knowledge would improve the figure to sixty-five years by 1944.

Closer co-operation between the family doctor and the specialist and between the medical profession generally and the public was continually emphasized in his teachings. It was his belief that medical schools should establish courses that would teach common-sense methods of practicing medicine to allay the submersion of the art of medicine in its scientific aspects.

At the time of his death he held the position, awarded him in 1918, of professor of surgery in the Mayo Foundation at the Graduate School of Medicine at the University of Minnesota. He was the author of many articles and books detailing the intricacies of abdominal operations.

A Fellow of the American College of Surgeons, Dr. Judd was a member of the American, Southern and Wstern Surgical Associations, of the Minnesota State and American Madical Associations, the Society of Clinical Surgery, the Minnesota Academy of Medicine, of Alpha Kappa and Sigma Xi fraternities, an honorary member of the Urologic Society of Brazil and a correspondent of the Royal Academy of Medicine at Rome.

Surviving, besides his wife, his son, Edward, and his daughters, Helen and Mary Jane, are a son, David, a of Minnesota, and another daughter, Mrs. A. Kirklin.

U.S. Economic Mission Issues Report On Japan

to the Mission reasonable and desirable that the Japanese should be invited to full official representation on this Committee.

Pottery and Cloisonne

In Nagoya the Mission was privileged to witness the extensive potteries of the Japan Porcelain Factory. Various articles are being fashioned and decorated to meet the tastes of countries for which they were being made. The operatives showed great skill, and the artists great taste, in the manufacture and decoration of the output. The Members of the Mission were impressed with the scientific exactness and skill with which this industry is conducted, not only in the choice of materials, but in all the elements entering into the manufacture. Profitable opportunities may be found for a further increase of this business to meet special requirements in the United States.

The Mission, after inspecting the important cloissonne works of Ando and Company, and seeing this ware in process of manufacture, were interested to learn of the extent to which this product was sold in the United States. Cloisonne ware, with its exquisite workmanship, is a specially in Japan and forms an interesting and profitable item of export to the United States.

Pearl Cultivation

One of the most interesting and successful enterprises developed in Japan is the cultivation of the pearl oyster and its inoculation for the production of what is known as cultivated pearls. The Mission was privileged to see Mr. Kokichi Mikimoto's establishment at Toba. This has become a very important and growing business. Many millions of treated oysters are being set out every year, and new and scientific methods have been devised to increase the number and improve the quality of the pearls secured. These are made up into various items of jewelry and shipped to agencies world-wide in scope. The business is the product of Japanese science and initiative and, in its line, is one of Japan's outstanding achievements.

Steel

In Kobe an extremely interesting visit was made to the Kawasaki steel works, where scrap steel was being worked over into sheets and bars.

The Japanese have for years been making extensive purchases of obsolete ships of other countries, which were scrapped to provide them with the materials for their new structures. The Mission was informed that they have discontinued the practice of scrapping old ships, but that all obsolete iron structures in Japan that can be utilized in this way are being torn down and melted for use in their local factories. The Mission also learned that Japanese iron works had recently contracted for heavy importations of iron ore from the Philippine Islands.

Oil

American and British interest have very extensive installations for the storage of oil in Japan, as well as gasoline supply stations and have jointly supplied approximately half of the Japanese consumption of oil and gasoline. Permits for conducting this business have been for short periods. The Japanese Government recently required an increase in the amount of storage to be carried by all the oil companies having business in Japan, to an extent so burdensome to the companies, in the matter of both construction and operation, that negotiations are being conducted to secure business on a more favorable basis. When calling on certain of the Japanese officials the Mission pointed out the unnecessary burdens—from a business point of view—imposed by the Petroleum Control Law on the entire Petroleum Industry in Japan, and expressed the hope that reasonable modifications could be effected. It is hoped that an early and satisfactory solution of this problem will be reached.

American Investments in Japan

Japan, like many other countries, has been experiencing a wave of nationalism, and this has manifested itself in a very keen desire for the nationalization of basic industries, particularly of public utilities. Many American businesses with branches in Japan have found it advantageous to organize under Japanese law—with a Japanese majority on the board of directors, Japanese high officers and, in many cases, a Japanese majority of the ownership of the stock represented in the equity. Some of the larger and more important of the American corporations have been operating satisfactorily on this basis for periods now running into years; and companies not so organized have found more difficulty in conducting their business in Japan than have those that have adopted this form of organization.

The skill and low cost of Japanese labor, and of some of the materials needed, have resulted in the erection of several important American branch factories in Japan: the Ford Motors and General Motors both have plants which in part are factories and in part assembling plants. The General Electric Company, the Singer Sewing Machine Company, Corn Products established themselves in Japan, usually, but not always, with satisfactory results.

Enterprises desirous of reaching Japanese markets must bear these facts in mind in making plans for cooperation with the Japanese in establishing their businesses.

The figures of American investments in Japan reach impressive totals. Recent estimates run well over four hundred million American dollars as the total American investment in Japan, of which about two hundred and fifty million are Japanese government obligations, national and local. Documents prepared for the Mission indicate that the United States holds nearly forty per cent of all foreign investments in Japan, while Great Britain has more than half of the total. In the British investments government securities predominate, while the United States has a larger proportion of investments in industry and non-governmental enterprises.

Communications

In regard to cable and radio rates, the Japanese business committees, in discussing the situation, expressed the very definite opinion that these rates are too high.

The recent vagaries of international exchange affect this situation, and it would undoubtedly be corrected by an international stabilization of exchange.

The Mission finds that there is an inequality in the rates charged that works to the disadvantage of the American business man, and feels that steps should be taken toward studying this situation to see if some adjustment cannot be arranged. The Mission notes, however, that this matter is not wholly in the hands of the communications companies. The last link of the cable service is owned by the Government of Japan, and their rates and desires have to be taken into consideration in any determination of rates. A similar situation exists as to radio rates between Japan and the United States. It is therefore recommended that this matter be made the subject of diplomatic approach; it being realized, however, that stabilization of exchange is undoubtedly the key situation.

Shipping

Japanese-American commerce is important to both the people of Japan and of the United States. Adequate modern shipping is essential to the fostering and further building up of this trade. This commerce rightly belongs to ships flying the Japanese and the American flags. Our friends across the Pacific have recognized the need of frequent ship services to foster trade. The Japanese have built recently no less than 58 large, modern and economical cargo motorships. This has been made possible by Japanese Government assistance in scrapping old ships and financing new constructions. These ships are ocean carriers with speeds ranging from 16 to 18¾ knots. The government subsidy was up to yen 54.00 per gross ton for speed of 18 knots and over. Another scrap-and-build program is now being undertaken by Japan, in accordance with which luxurious and fast combination passenger and freight ships will be built, particularly for the trans-Pacific trade. The modern fleet of Japan today is 82.5 per cent motorized.

In ships of over 100 gross tons, built during 1933 and 1934, the United States presents a significant contrast with Japanese tonnage.

The Japanese merchant fleet in 1895 was comparatively insignificant—amounting to some 270,000 gross tons. By purchase of American ships, a Japanese trans-Pacific service was commenced in 1908. In 1914, the Japanese had a total of 1,103 ships of 1,708,386 gross tons, in ships of over 100 gross tons each. Since then the growth of the Japanese mercantile marine has been phenomenal. By 1934, Japan had 1,949 ships of 4,072,707 gross tons.

Percentage of Trade

Japanese vessels carry 80 per cent of Japan's foreign overseas commerce. Of the other 20 per cent, British ships carry ten per cent, and the balance is carried in American and ships of other nations. These figures may be compared with similar ones for the United States.

American ships carry no more than about 36.5 per cent of American overseas trade; foreign ships carry the other 63.5 per cent. The United States must build at least 150,000 gross tons of new and suitable ships per year to maintain even this modest share.

This significant fact is that Japan is rapidly producing a very modern fleet of both fast and economical ships, while the American vessels, built during the World War, are costly to operate and will, within a few years, become obsolete. As a result of the Jones-White Act of 1928, thirty-two very fine American ships were built, but so far as the trans-Pacific Orient trade is concerned, only two superior ships have been built since the War program of the United States Shipping Board. They are the Dollar steamships President Hoover and President Coolidge.

The Mission recommends that Japanese immigration into the United States be placed on a quota basis. According to information placed before the Mission, this would not result in any appreciable increase in the number of Japanese introduced into the United States, as the quota would be so small as to be negligible from the point of view to its effect on American labor. It would, however, remove a cause of irritation that tends to alienate the feelings of many of the best friends of America in Japan.

Oppenheimer Asks Land 'Liberation'

German Economist Proposes Solution Of Economic Ills By Easing Monopoly

A simple solution of all economic evils is offered by Dr. Franz Oppenheimer, German sociologist and economist, who was the guest of honor at a dinner under the sponsorship of Professor Albert Einstein, Felix Frankfurter, Ludwig Lewisohn, Professor Henry Pratt Fairchild, Dr. Frederick B. Robinson, Professor Horace M. Kallen, Professor Harry A Overstreet and other leading thinkers, in New York on November 24.

Dr. Oppenheimer, who is 72 years old and whose major work fills eight volumes, issued the following statement to the New York Times the same day:

"I am one who sees the way out. All I ask is for that way to be noticed. Not enough attention has been paid to it, in spite of the fact that I am one of the acknowledged theorists of my time."

"There is no real conflict between communism and capitalism when they are examined logically. The conflict rests on a premise accepted by both sides, which is incorrect. Both sides admit that free competition is associated with great evils. Then they proceed to reason. The capitalist says these evils are unavoidable. The Communist says they are unbearable.

Free Competition a Myth

"Both are in the same error, because I hold that free competition is not associated with evils. To blame it is wrong. I offer the novel contention that we have not had free competition in 6,000 years.

"Now I will show why we have not had free competition. Where there is any important monopoly, there is no free competition. One excludes the other. Yet the monopoly of the land is one of the most striking features of our economy.

"A minority is in possession of the land while the majoriy has little or none. The landless majority must depend on the others, and that is a characteristic of monopoly. There may be competition among the monopolists, but that is not free competition. The task of our time is, therefore, not to abolish competition but to free it by abolishing the monopoly of the land.

"History gives evidence that capitalism is lodged in the land monopoly. Wherever a pioneer can get to free land the laborer has disappeared from hire and put land to his own support. Take examples in the history of America. It was so in Colonial American days, and it was still so until the open lands of the West were enclosed.

Would Take 10 Per Cent of Land

"Other theorists have been somewhat aware of the land monopoly as the root of economic and sociologic evils, but their schemes of nationalization have been too ambitious. They could never be imposed against the opposition of people who own small pieces of land.

"But I do not believe it is necessary to nationalize the entire land. To take a fortress, you make only a breach in the wall; you do not find it necessary to take down the entire wall.

"To correct all the present economic difficulties I believe, as a result of more than forty years of thinking, we have only to take 10 per cent of the land. It would be properly paid for by the nation and would be redistributed on easy terms among those who would like to return to the soil. Then equilibrium would return.

"The supply of laborers would diminish and wages of those who remained as laborers would rise. Surplus production, crises and the exploitation of labor would disappear.

"There is a serfdom of the land as well as of mankind. Revolutions of the past have only liberated man. We must now liberate the land."

The interview was given at the Great Northern Hotel in connection with the announcement of the dinner in his honor, which organized by the New York Zionist Club in recognition of Dr. Oppenheimer's work in furthering cooperative colonization in Palestine.

Dr. Oppenheimer, who recently arrived in New York from Germany and who declared he expects to return there as soon as he arranges for the publication of his latest work in the U. S., will address the dinner guests on the race problem.

NEW YEAR'S BALL

The New Year's eve dance given at the Imperial Hotel was one of the most successful social events in the history of this entertainment center. The affair was held in the banquet hall which had been specially decorated for the occasion under the supervision of Mr. T. Tomimori. From the lofty central ceiling hung a gay canopy of pendant mock jewels. Above the orchestra a house was represented with a clock, the illuminated hands of which pointed toward midnight. On the walls of the house 1935 shone forth brightly.

At the stroke of twelve the death of the old and the arrival of the new year was signalled by the clock indicating the hour, while the 5 disappeared as though by magic and 6 was substituted. Without delay the dancers gathered together and sang "Auld Lang Syne," and stamped and circled in celebration of the new born year.

Previous to the dance, dinner was served at individual tables, and many dancers came later on in the evening, the musicians continuing their program until 2 a.m.

Chinese Art Exhibition Covers 35 Centuries

near them. "Tube; bronze" (409) gives the perfection of gold and silver inlay, and other bronzes to be noted are Nos. 412 and 570. In this room, too, are the now familiar. Head and Shoulders of a Horse" (553), from the Eumorfopoulos collection, and also another beautiful "Horse's Head" (530) in jade. In sculpture the dominating things are "Seated Bodhisattva" (479) and "Buddhist Figure" (476).

Most authorities hold that the Tang Dynasty (A.D. 618-906,) represented in Gallery III. as well as in the Lecture Room, saw the noblest development of Chinese art. Paintings begin here, but they are known to us only in fragments or in later copies. Han figure paintings have carrying power, and attention may be called to Nos. 675, 676, and 679 for their extraordinary solidity of effect, obtained entirely by the outlines, since the color is flat. The affinity of these fragments with the Ajanta cave paintings in India, familiar to most of us in reproduction, will not escape notice, and it may be supposed that T'ang wall paintings, about contemporary, rivalled them. Regarded by experts as two of the finest paintings in the exhibition are "Herd of Deer in Grove" (755) and "Drunken Orgy" (810), both of which have hints, not of influence from but of affinity with Europe. Presiding over the room, and calming it, is a "Seated Lohan" (789), in dry lacquer, of the Sung Dynasty.

All the rest of the rooms are, so to speak, "easier," because their beauties call—except in the paintings, to be discussed later—directly to the eye. Outstanding things are the "Yak; ivory" (1,033), in Gallery IV., the cases of Sung potteries and porcelains, and the sculptures in the Lecuture Room. A noble example is "Panel from the Tomb of T'ang T'ai Tsung" (2,387), representing him with his bay charger, carved in stone—one of six panels of the kind. "Standing Bodhisattva" (2,498), apart from its grace, may be noted for its historical interest as showing the fusion of Greek, Indian, and Chinese characters. It might be called a glorious mongrel.

The big Gallery IX. is for the sophisticated rather than the simple taste. Nothing but praise can be given to its decorative arrangement, with screens, tapestries, and carpets on the walls, and cases of eighteenth-century porcelains. In such an exhibition one looks for something to curse, and finds it in "Vase; porcelain" (2,170), in Gallery XI. It is a miracle of workmanship, but it reminds one of what one's aunt used to do on terra-cotta with scraps cut from nurserymen's catalogues.

Much Feasting Takes Place On New Year's Day

Special Foods And Drinks For Occasion All Have Particular Significance

Feasting characterizes happy occaions of all countries and peoples, nd the Japanese New Year is also elebrated with much feasting. "Kuishogatsu" (Eating New Year) is an xpression very commonly used although it is a trifle vulgar.

The first thing the Japanese family oes on the morning of New Year's ay is to draw "Waka-mizu" (Young water). They make it a quite ceremonious thing to draw the first bucket of water from the well. This rst bucketful of water is called Waka-Mizu" which means "young water," "first water." Water being of the first importance to daily life, he "Wakamizu" drawing is made quite an occasion, and poets of past centuries have sung beautiful poems on the occasion.

When the family members all rise, wash, and dress in their new ceremonious garments, they sit down to the first feast of New Year. Sometimes this first feast is held just at dawn when the house is still in semi-darkness. The first thing is to greet every member of the house with a merry "Omedeto," and then they sit down in the guest room. "Fukucha" (Prosperity tea) is then drunk. It is often a common green tea with small "Umeboshi.. (pickled plums) placed in each cup, but "Kobucha (Lamanaria tea) is also used for this purpose. Tea and pickled plums are known to expel evil diseases.

New Year Drink

Then comes "Toso". This is the special New Year drink which is not taken at any other time. "Toso" is a mixture of various herbs, fruit peels, and roots, consisting mostly of Japanese pepper, ginger, cinnamon, rhubarb, red beans, siler divaricatum, bell flower roots, and other ingredients which are ground and then placed in a small silk bag. This bag is placed in a bottle of "Mirin" (sweet sake). The drink thus made is believed to have the virtues of dispelling evil disease, and building up health.

This is no idle tradition, as modern scientists have proved that the ingredients composing "Toso" have certain medicinal values to improve digestion, to better the blood circulation, and to build up health. So there was quite a reason for people of the past setting custom of starting the New Year with a cup of "Toso" It is indeed a fit prayer and drink to begin a new life with.

"Toso" drinking is performed solemnly as it is the most important one on New Year's Day. The master drinks of it first, then the wife, and after her come the children and servants. Each drinks a cup of "Toso" to mark the beginning of New Year.

"Mochi" Is Necessary

When the ceremonious drinking of "Toso is done, "Zoni" is taken. It is something like a soup with "Mochi," fowl, and vegetables. Sometimes it is made of clear soup, but again it is made of "Miso" (bean) soup. This is also a special dish for the year-beginning celebration. Rich or poor, young or old, they all partake of this "Zoni".

Generally "Toso" and "Zoni" take the place of the ordinary breakfast on the first morning of the year. This dish is also partaken of again on the second and also the third morning.

"Mochi" is characteristically the New Year food, and it is eaten everywhere in various different ways. "Mochi" is made on all festive occasions, but also during the cold winter season, as it is believed that eating "Mochi" will warm one. All through the first month of the year, "Mochi" is eaten by all people.

For the first seven days of the year, all families partake of specially prepared dinners, luxurious, rich, and abundant. Anything good to eat, and any wine good to drink, is always offered freely. But there are a few special dishes which give the dinner table a peculiar New Year atmosphere.

Other Special Dishes

"Kazunoko" (Herring roe) comes first among such New Year dishes. Its name means "Innumerable offsprings," and stands for prosperity and large families. The social system of the country having been built on the family, a large and prosperous family has always been the aim of the people. They eat "Kazunoko" during the New Year celebration with the hope that their family will prosper and increase in number as the herring family does. Probably herring roe was selected for this occasion because the herring possesses quite a large amount of roe considering its size.

"Mame" (beans) and "Gomame" (dried sardines) cooked separately or together also have a very happy meaning. "Mame" also means activity and health, and the above two are considered to have virtues to make their eaters active and healthy.

Besides these special New Year dishes, there appear on the table. "Tai" (Red Porgy) "Kamaboko" (Fish meat paste), fowls vegetables of all kinds and other dishes that tend to make feasting a pleasure.

The New Year feasting is peculiar because the feasting lasts for seven days generally, and often for fifteen days. When the season is over the sufferers from troubles of digestive organs are quite numerous, but it is quite natural considering the heavy and continued feasting the people indulge in.

Italy To Get Medals Allies Gave Veterans

The directorate of the Italian National Association of Combatants decided on Nov. 30 to give to the government all medals its members received from Allied nations in the World War. Every World War veteran in Italy belongs to the organization, says the New York Herald Tribune.

The action was taken because the medals "lost their value as a symbol of the solidarity which the sacrifice of the dead for a common cause should be assured among survivors," the announcement said.

Noted American Sees Trend To Peace In World

Elihu Root, 90, Says Turmoil Is Sign Of Improvement In N.Y. Address

The trustees of the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace observed the twenty-fifth anniversary of the organization on Dec. 14 with a meeting at the home of Mrs. Andrew Carnegie, 2 East Ninety-first Street, New York city sounding a note of pride in the progress of peace in the past and of hope and faith in the future.

Elihu Root, who was president of the endowment for its first fifteen years, spoke of the turmoil of international affairs at present and was undismayed. Rather he found encouraging symptoms of a trend toward world peace, writes the New York Herald Tribune. The troubled state of the nations, he said, did not indicate the degradation of morals but a standard of judging national conduct higher than that of the past, and in this he saw a hope that the cause of peace was marching on the surest road to achievement.

Mr. Root will be ninety-one years next February 15. The speech marked one of his few public utterances in recent years.

The same optimistic note expressed by him was struck in a pamphlet issued by the endowment to record its major accomplishments.

Work Is Called Justified

"Twenty-five years of work on behalf of world peace by the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace have been justified," the pamphlet said. "The alert, intelligent youth of all lands see the problem clearly. It remains for the more mature to change their habits of thought, to discard ox-cart thinking in international affairs for modern thinking in harmony with the present age."

Besides Mr. Root, other officers and trustees of the endowment reviewed the history of its efforts for peace, including Dr. Nicholas Murray Butler, president of the endowment; Dr. James Brown Scott, secretary, and Henry S. Pritchett, one of the original trustees. The anniversary observance was combined with the regular semi-annual meeting of the endowment. Mrs. Carnegie, who attended the meeting with her daughter Mrs. Roswell Miller, entertained the trustees at luncheon.

The printed record of the endowment's struggle traced the peace movement from its beginnings in the United States in 1910, when the endowment was founded, with the first trustees' meeting in Washington on December 14, to the present, "when discussions on peace and the complex problems of international relations are recognized as news in every metropolitan newspaper office in the country."

Lists Its Achievements

It lis ed the following achievements:

"The creation of the League of Nations and the settlement of many important controversies by it;

"The creation of the international labor organization;

"The establishment of the Permanent Court of International Justice and its contributions to the development of international law;

"The compilation of the first economic and social history of the World War;

"The realization that trade barriers and trade altercation are the real and underlying causes of most wars and the setting in motion of machinery to solve this problem;

"The tremendous advancement in the codification of international law; an alert, informed public opinion in favor of peaceful settlement of all international disputes;

"An evaluation of the cost of wars in human lives, happiness and in economic values;

"The Pact of Paris, which renounced war as an instrument of national policy and in which sixty-three nations are joined under the Pact of Paris;

"The Locarno pact. The Locarno treaties between Germany, Belgium, France, Great Britain and Italy are the guaranty by these five powers of the frontiers between Germany and Belgium and Germany and France and provide, in case of violation, that Great Britain and Italy will aid the country attacked."

Elihu Root Speaks

Mr. Root, in the brief address which explained his refusal to be alarmed at the condition of world, said:

"The condition of affairs in the world today fills many good people with dismay," he said, "but I think there is a view which should be taken leading to quite a different conclusion. I think the attitude of Western civilization illustrates not a decadence in conduct or in morals but rather a lifting of standards of conduct, conformity to which we insensibly demand.

"A thousand things are done internationally similar to things which have been done in the past. We condemn them now, but they would not have been condemned then. The standard that we apply today in our judgment of the conduct of nations is a different standard from that which was applied when England acquired India, and France, Algeria, and the United States, Arizona and New Mexico and California, and the comparison between public opinion and feeling of the world when those things happened and the public feeling and opinion of the world today is evidence that the cause of peace among men is advancing along the only path by which true progress in civilization can be reached, the path of gradually rising standard which is instinctively applied to the conduct of nations."

Summary of Aims

Dr. Scott presented a summary of the endowment's aims and purposes as set forth by the original committee on organization in 1910:

"To promote a thorough and scientific investigation and study of the causes of war and of the practical methods to prevent avoid it.

"To aid in the development of international law, and a general agreement of the rules thereof, and the acceptance of the same among nations.

"To diffuse information, and to educate public opinion regarding the causes, nature and effects of war and means for its prevention and avoidance.

"To establish a letter understanding of international rights and duties, and a more perfect sense of international justice among the inhabitants of civilized countries.

"To cultivate friendly feelings between the inhabitants of different countries, and to increase the knowledge and understanding of each other by the several nations.

"To promote a general acceptance of peaceable methods in the settlement of international disputes.

"To maintain, promote and assist such establishments, organizations, associations and agencies as shall be deemed necessary or useful in the accomplishment of the purposes of the corporation, or any of them.

"To take and hold such property, real or personal, and to invest and keep invested and receive and apply the income of such funds and to construct and maintain such buildings or establishments, as shall be deemed necessary to prosecute and develop the purposes of the corporation, or any of them.

"To do and perform all lawful acts or things necessary or proper in the judgment of the trustees to promote the objects of the corporation."

Among those present at the meeting were the following trustees: Wallace McK. Alexander, William M. Bullitt, Nicholas Murray Butler, Daniel K. Catlin, John W. Davis, Austen G. Fox, Francis P. Gaines, Charles S. Hamlin, Alanson B. Houghton, Frank O. Lowden, Peter Molyneaux, Roland S. Morris, Elihu Root, Edward Larned Ryersson jr., Dr. James Brown Scott, Maurice S. Sherman, James T. Shotlell, Robert A. Taft and Thomas J. Watson.

Finch, assistant secretary of the Endowment; Henry S. Haskell, assistant to the director of the division of intercourse and education; Count Carlo Sforza, former Minister of Foreign Affairs of Italy and member of the Comite du Centre Europeen, and Count Paul Teleki, former Minister of Foreign Affairs of Hungary and member of the Comite.

Townsend Plan Gains Alarm 2 Major US Parties

Sentiment For Revolving Pensions May Force Change In Campaign Strategy

Political leaders in Washington saw the rapid growth of the Townsend $200-a-month pension plan forcing modifications in the platforms of both the leading parties, about the middle of December. Meanwhile Dr. Townsend declared that his group is now in a position to dominate the American government and dictate the choice of political candidates.

Welfare agencies of thirty-nine states meeting in the capital laid plans to care for 2,000,000 "unemployables" under a national security program, at that time, says the New York Herald Tribune.

The gathering of politicians in the U. S. capital occasioned by the meeting of the Republican National Committee on December 9 and the Gridiron Club dinner on December 14 brought out emphatically two trends of political thought of importance to the forthcoming Presidential campaign, says Ernest K. Lendby in the same journal whose article of the latter date continues:

The first of these is the startling expansion of the Townsend old-age revolving pensions movement. Several political leaders from different parts of the country, interviewed today, admitted privately that this movement has been growing by leaps and bounds. While many of them doubt that Dr. Francis E. Townsend really intends to execute his threat, announced yesterday, to organize a third party, there seems to be an almost unanimous opinion that the Townsendites may force some modification of political strategy next year on the part of both major parties.

A. A. A. Grows as Issue

The second trend, to which emphasis was given in several quarters, is a softening of opposition to some of the fundamentals of the New Deal's agricultural program on the part of some of the conservative Republicans who were most outspoken in their attacks on the A. A. A. six months ago.

Harrison E. Spangler, national committeeman for Iowa, who is in charge of the Western headquarters of the Republican National Committee at Chicago, said, at a press conference today, that the drafting of tentative Republican farm planks necessarily would await the Supreme Court's decision on the A. A. A. He said, however, that so long as unusual conditions continue to prevail the Republican party would have to offer a constructive farm program.

Asked if he thought the Republicans would join issue with the Democrats on the A. A. A., Mr. Spangler said he thought both the Republicans and the Administration would have to wait for the Supreme Court's decision before they could answer that question, but that the opposition party did not necessarily have to make a "frontal attack" on everything that the party in power had done. A large number of people are working on proposals for a Republican farm program, he said.

Mr. Spangler said that his own preference was for a program which would take into view long-range needs, by providing for the retirement from production or enrichment by soil-building crops of submarginal lands.

Mr. Spangler was an unsparing critic of the A. A. A. at the Republican "Grass-Roots" conference at Springfield, Ill., early last summer, and led the opposition to the adoption of a liberal farm plank by that conference. Today he refused to be drawn into any direct controversy with the Administration on the question of agricultural policy.

When the Republican National Committee meets Monday it will have before it bids from Chicago, Kansas City and Cleveland. Cleveland seems to be running a bit ahead in the favor of the Republicans already here, with Chicago second. The fact that the 1932 convention was held in Chicago seems to be militating against the choice of the Windy City again, although some Republicans are saying that Cleveland is not far enough west to provide a good sounding board for the farm belt. Kansas City, seat of the Republican National Convention in 1928, is meeting with such criticisms as the risk of hot weather and its limited facilities.

Each of the three cities had offers of $150,000 to make. The Kansas City delegation had in its possession a certified check for $150,000 which will be placed at the disposal of the Republican National Committee if the invitation is accepted.

Kansas City has just completed a new municipal auditorium at a cost of about $6,500,000, which was planned expressly to meet the needs of political conventions. The auditorium has an amphitheater seating regularly 14,000 people with the possibility of providing 3,000 additional temporary seats. It is air-conditioned throughout.

In connection with the uneasiness in both major political parties over the Townsend old-age pension movement, a Senator, from an Eastern state told today how he had discovered to his own wonder the prevalence and strength of the Townsendites. After he had made a speech attacking the Townsend movement he was literally overwhelmed by bitter letters from people in his own state. He found for the first time that Townsend groups were organized in a great many towns in his balliwick. It was his opinion that a real champion of the Townsend program might defeat a candidate of either of the old parties even in his conservative state.

There remained a doubt in political Washington, however, over whether Dr. Townsend would really go through with his plan for a third party. Some still thought the announcement was more of a threat designed to push old-party Congressional candidates into indorsing the Townsend plan.

Sadanji In Old And New Plays

hairs of his beard with a huge pair of tweezers and when he lays them down they suddenly rise on end. A knife he puts aside also acts in this unaccustomed manner, the accomodating property man managing the effect on the end of a rod.

Then the Yedo stage sleuth exercises his wits and with the aid of a long halbert brings down the criminal from the ceiling where he has been concealed with a huge magnet, thereby causing all the trouble in the household

Ennosuke's Comic Dance

Nothing, however, on the Tokyo Gekijo program is more enjoyable than Ennosuke's comic dance in "Akutaro," an adaptation of a No farce by Shiko Okamura. He appears as a youth who partakes of sake not wisely but too well to the disgust of his uncle. Under the influence he torments a priest, and then overcome by the liquor he goes to sleep. His uncle to teach him a lesson shaves his head and gives him a priest's coat, a rosary and a metal gong and mallet for Buddhist devotions. When he awakens he is astonished at his changed condition and dances with the returned priest imitating the words and intonation of the real man of holy orders.

Play by Okamoto

Two plays by Kido Okamoto are on the program, Sadanji seldom appearing without the support of his faithful playwright. The first, "Okubo Hikozayemon," is an historical play of early Tokugawa days. The play, however, has a decidedly modern tone, as it treats of ronin out of jobs. Okubo befriends samurai who have no work and his mansion is crowded with these two-sworded gentry. There is an outbreak in Amakusa in Kyushu between the Christians and officials, and forces are dispatched. Okubo visits the Yedo palace but returns in disappointment. Later, however, through Lady Kasuga, the faithful old nurse of the shogun, he is able to obtain funds, and sends the ronin away rejoicing with money swords and armor.

With Shinjuku Setting

"Shinjuku Yawa" (Story of Shinjuku), the second offering by Kido Okamoto, takes the playgoers back to the old day when the now prosperous district of Tokyo was a straggling country village. The old inn makes an attractive setting, the keeper of the place telling of events in previous days and the reason why there is no longer a gay quarter in the place.

The scene then changes to a youth quarrelling with persons frequenting the courtesan quarter. His brother, a dignitary of the shogunate appears, discovers the delinquent, and advises him to commit harakiri. The scene then changes back to the old inn at night time as the lights are being put out and the guests going to bed.

A one-act comedy by Inosuke Matsuda concerning a man who escaped being cut down by the sword because his body was burned by moxa gives Ennosuke an opportunity to keep the audience thoroughly entertained. A gay dance concludes one of the best New Year programs of the Tokyo stage.

British Scientist Wears Red, Mauve, Blue Vest

Professor Henry E. Armstrong, distinguished scientist and oldest Fellow of the Royal Society, created a sensation at a dinner of the Old Students Club of the Working Men's College of North London recently by appearing as guest of honor wearing beneath a brown velvet jacket a waistcoat of vivid magenta (purplish red) with one lapel mauve and the other blue, according to the New York Herald Tribune.

"I want to do everything that everybody else doesn't do," the professor, who is eighty-seven years old, explained. "I am trying by hardest to overcome the indecent shyness of Englishmen.

"You cannot persuade men these days to wear colors. In other days they gloried in color, in velvet and lace, and the effect was charming. Modern costumes are not charming."

U.S. President Defends Measures On Farming

textiles in the manufacture of automobiles.

There you have the complete chain. The cotton-growing South, with more money to spend, buys new automobiles. The automobile makers buy more cotton goods from manufacturers in the Northeast and these manufacturers in turn go into the market for more cotton. Goods are moving again, and as goods are moving, so is money moving once more, and as it flows millions of farm and city families are getting a bigger share of the national income.

Net Benefits

I think it is safe to say that although prices for farm products show many increases over depression blows, the farm program instead of burdening consumers as a group has actually given them net benefits.

There are individuals whose incomes have not risen in proportion to the rise in certain food prices, but at the same time the total net income of city dwellers is several billion dollars higher than in 1932, and I think you will agree with me that bargain prices for food in 1932 were little consolation to people in cities with no income whatsoever.

Though food prices in the cities are not on the average as high as they were, for example, in 1929, yet they are in many cases too high. It is difficult to explain why, in many cases, if the farmer gets an increase for his food crop over what he got three years ago, the consumer in the city has to pay two and three and four times the amount of that increase.

Lifting prices on the farm up to the level where the farmer and his family can live is opposed chiefly by the few who profited heavily from the depression. It is they and their henchmen who are doing their best to foment city people against the farmers and the farm program. It is that type of political profiteer who seeks to discredit the vote in favor of a continued corn-hog program by comparing your desire for a fair price for the farmer to the appetite of hogs for corn.

Yet I know that the great masses of city people are fair-minded. They, like yourslves, suffered deeply from the depression, and I believe with all my heart that millions of these city people, struggling back toward better days, resent the attempts of political advantage seekers and profiteers to heap ridicule upon the recovery efforts that all of us are making.

Farmers and Discord

Some of the same type of individuals and groups are also trying to stir up farmers against other phases of the broad recovery program. Dispensers of discord are saying that farmers have been victimized by the new reciprocal trade agreement with Canada, and are painting pictures of a great flood of imports of farm products rushing across the border.

Just as I am confident that the great masses of city people are fair-minded, so I am sure that the great majority of American farmers will be fair in their judgment of the new trade agreement.

If the calamity howlers should happen to be right, you have every assurance that Canada and the United States will join in correcting inequalities, but I do not believe for a single moment that the calamity howlers are right.

Agriculture, far from being crucified by this agreement, as some have told you, actually gains from it. We export more agricultural products to Canada than we have imported from her. We shall continue to do so for the very simple reason that the United States, with its larger area of agricultural land, its more varied climate and its vastly greater population, produces far more of most agricultural products, including animal products, vegetables and fruits, than does Canada.

In the case of the few reductions that have been made, quota limitations are set on the amount that may be brought in at the lower rates.

On the other side of the picture, we believe, and most unbiased men believe, that the general increase in our trade with Canada, including the exports of our factories, will so add to the purchasing power of hundreds of thousands of wage-earners that they will be able to spend far more than they do today for the products of our own farms, our own forests and our own fisheries.

Greater Trade

Greater trade is merely another word for more production and more employment. The proof of this particular pudding is in the eating; the best way to judge the new accord is to observe how it works out. Analyze and remember the source and the motives of the objections. Remember, too, the old saying, "It all depends on whose baby has the measles."

But the success that has attended and is attending our efforts to stem the depression and set the tide running the other way cannot blind us to the necessity of looking ahead to the permanent measures which are necessary to a more stable, economic life. We are regaining a more fair balance among the groups that constitute the nation and we must look to the factors that will make that balance stable.

The thing we all are seeking is justice in the commonsense interpretation of that word—the interpretation that means "do unto your neighbor as you would be done by."

That interpretation means justice against exploitation on the part of those who do not care much for the lives, the happiness and the prosperity of their neighbors.

The nation applauds the efforts of its agencies of government to deal swiftly with kidnappers, gangsters and racketeers. That is justice.

The nation applauds the efforts of its agencies of government to save innocent victims from wildcat banking, from watered stocks, and from all other kinds of "confidence games." That is justice.

Social Security

The nation applauds the efforts of government to obtain and to maintain fair rewards for labor, whether it be the labor of the farmer or the labor of the factory worker or the labor of the white-collar man. That is justice.

The natin applauds efforts, through the agencies of government, to give a greater social security to the aged and to the unemployed, to improve health, and to create better opportunities for our young people. That, too, is justice.

In this quest for justice we have made progress. It is a lasting progress because the people of the nation have learned more about effective cooperation in the past two and a half years than in the previous twenty-five years. We understand more than ever before what that term "the seamless web" means..

We seek to balance agriculture and we have made great strides. But in balancing agriculture we know that it must be in balance not alone with itself, but with industry and business as well—that the producing public must give consideration to the consuming public.

Year by year, as we go on many details, many problems will need to be analyzed and solved. Agriculture and industry and business are in overwhelming majorities cooperating for a common justice as never before.

In these present days we have seen and are seeing, not a rebirth of material prosperity alone; of greater significance to our national future is that spiritual reawakening, that deeper understanding that has come to our land.

We who strive to dispel the bitterness and the littleness of the few who still think and talk in terms of the old and utter selfishness, we are working toward the destruction of sectionalism, of class antagonism and of malice.

We who strive for cooperation among all parts of our great population in every part of the nation, we intend to win through to a better day. We strive for America, and if we shall succeed, as by God's help we will, America will point the way toward a better world.

Canada's Premiers Appeal To Britain On Constitution

Want Substantial Increase In Grants By Federal Govt. To Reduce Tax Levies

Agreement on the necessity of immediate action toward relieving municipalities of their tax burden through a substantial increase in the Dominion grants or contributions to the Provinces by the Federal Government was one of the most important results of the Dominion-Provincial Conference, which ended its sessions at Ottawa recently, according to the Christian Science Monitor.

Of marked importance in its bearing on future legislation was the all but unanimous verdict to request from the British Government the right now enjoyed by all the other self-governing Dominions to amend the Constitution without reference to the Privy Council in England.

Closer Understanding

The real success of the conference, however, lies in the mutual knowledge and understanding reached by all Governments in regard to their respective and collective problems and the method by which they may be solved. As the Prime Minister, W. L. Mackenzie King, reminded the press at the close of the plenary session, like the Imperial Conference this was a meeting solely for the exchange of information and receiving reports with recommendations and could not possibly take action on its reports. The resolutions are not binding on the ten Parliaments. Undoubtedly, however, most of the agreements reached by the six committees will eventually bear practical fruit, says the Monitor article which continues:

Successful Session

Although, as in the case of the Imperial Economic Conference, held here in 1932, the information contained in the daily official communiques was mainly conspicuous by its absence, and the concluding plenary session was held "in camera," enough news of developments leaked out to warrant the conviction that the conference has proved eminently successful, thus affording striking contrast to all previous gatherings of this kind.

Perhaps the most important agreement reached was the one in connection with the amending of the Constitution. The constitutional committee, headed by Ernest Lapointe, Minister of Justice, and including representatives of all the provinces, decided that Canada in future should be able to amend its Constitution by the will of the Federal Parliament and the unanimous consent of all the provincial legislatures without an appeal to the British Privy Council.

Minority Jealousies

Hitherto no progress has been made in handling this most continuous of all questions. Quebec in particular has always demanded "hands off" when it came to tampering with the British North America Act, fearful of being deprived by the English-speaking majority of certain "minority rights" Confederation. That Premier Taschereau of Quebec agreed to the change speaks eloquently for the growth of racial and religious unity and goodwill throughout the Dominion.

It is understood that the need of amending the constitution and the procedure to be adopted were alone decided upon, and that the committee did not discuss any particular amendment at this time. Even at that the report is considered the keystone of the conference, as little action can be taken in the matters of finance, taxation, social service and so forth until clarity in the fields of responsibility is definitely settled and subsequent legislation freed from possibility of challenge.

Refunding Urged

Of outstanding importance, also, was the work undertaken by the committee on unemployment and relief questions. It was known that all the provinces, with the pressure of their cities and towns behind them, were urging the Dominion to launch a nation-wide refunding program as a means of lessening the intolerable burden of unemployment relief.

William Aberhart, of Alberta, declared that if outstanding public obligations of his province were refunded at 2½ per cent it would mean a saving of some $3,000,000 annually, and Premier Mitchel Hepburn said that if the interest rate was set at 3 per cent Ontario would have annually $16,000,000. The Federal Government took the stand, however, that if it is to guarantee such loans it must have all say in future provincial loans—thus abrogating a provincial right. The provinces are naturally loath to agree to this. Norman McLeod Rogers, minister of labor and chairman of this committee, has made no announcement in regard to the matter.

Relief Registration

The committee also arranged for the registration and classification of all those on relief, after considering a report from a subcommittee under the chairmanship of Dr. R. H. Coats, Dominion statistician, on the subject. It also defined the functions and duties of the proposed National Commission on Unemployment and Relief.

The committee on finance, headed by Charles Dunning, Minister of Finance, found that the problems of financial relations as between the provinces and the Dominion were too great to be definitely settled in such a short space of time, and so a continuing committee of 10, representing all the provinces and the Dominion, has been appointed to endeavor to reach an agreement at an early date.

No New Farm Plan

In the realm of agriculture and marketing, little progress could be made by the committee under James G. Gardiner, Minister of Agriculture, on account of the Natural Products Marketing Act and the Farmers Creditors Arrangement Act passed by the former Government, which are among the half dozen statutes referred to the Supreme Court of Canada for decision as to their constitutional validity.

The committee stated that no new schemes under these statutes would be considered. It was agreed that very effective co-operation already exists as between the Dominion and provincial marketing services and recommendations were made for further joint action along particular lines to be discussed by officials of the departments concerned.

The Dominion Government was urged to continue the making of loans on farm mortgages and to reduce interest on present and future loans to 4 per cent, and also to restore the former annual grant of $1,000,000, in aid of agriculture.

The committee pointed out the importance of developing all possible export markets for both seed and table-stock potatoes.

In the mining committee, under T. A. Crerar, Minister of Mines, the principle was accepted that it was in the national interests to achieve as far as possible on the part of the Dominion and provinces alike a plan of stability in mining taxation for a period of years. It was also agreed that the committee should submit a report urging that when a national conference is called in regard to uniform company laws, full consideration should be given to all matters concerning flotation of campanies for the purpose of carrying on mining operations. Taxation measures to prevent the duplication of taxation were also reviewed at length by a subcommittee.

Tourist Attractions

Unification of all highway regulations, motor vehicle laws and rules governing the use of buses and trucks was materially advanced by the committee on transportation and tourist traffic, while a subcommittee agreed on the desirability of rushing the trans-Canada highway to completion and on how the costs should be divided. Only in British Columbia and Ontario are there open sections, but considerable improvement of existing roads will have to be made in other provinces in order to bring them up to the standard set for the highway.

This committee also recommended a stock taking of all Canada's tourist attractions, potential and actual, that more national parks be established, and that every effort be made to achieve dust-free highways.

Creation of some permanent form of the Dominion-Provincial Conference is indicated in the admission of the leaders of several committees that the problems facing them were too great to admit their reaching definite conclusions in such a brief space of time as was allotted to them.

King George A Marksman, One Of 6 Best In England

King George, now in his seventieth year, is still one of the six best marksmen in England, says Wentworth Day in a book published in London recently.

The author declares that persons who believe the monarch's ability is exaggerated because of his position are mistaken, according to the New York Times.

The book, "King George as a sportsman," relates that when the King goes shooting, his private detective records the number of times the monarch brings down a bird, and the figure is entered in his game book later.

Serves Year In Prison For One She Resembles

All because she resembled another woman, Mrs. Louise Botts, twenty-six years old, of Brazil, Ind., served more than a year in the Indiana woman's prison at Indianapolis. Governor Paul V. McNutt pardoned her on Dec. 14 on recommendation both of Mrs. Marian Gallup, superintendent of the prison, and of the State Clemency Commission.

Mrs. Botts was convicted in Kokomo on November 22, 1934, of forgery and sentenced to prison for from two to fourteen years, according to the New York Herald Tribune.

She persisted that she was innocent and that she was not in Kokome at the time the bogus checks were passed.

When C. A. O'Neal, Chief of Police at Kokomo, told the clemency commission that Mrs. Botts undoubtedly was innocent because similar forged checks have appeared recently, the pardon followed.

Missionary In Manchuria Tells Of Improvements

churches to do all in their power to preserve national peace. Among other things he said: "The church is a sponsor and advocate of peace, and I know that you will agree with me that at this moment, when there is a menace of war that may not be confined to any two nations, there is a weighty obligation resting on the church to exert itself in every conceivable manner to impress the people with a hatred of war and a love of peace."

Teachings of Bible

(4) The teachings of the Bible, which the missionaries and the native Christians propose to teach to others as their very life and purpose, carry a gospel of peace as one of their very first messages. Christ is known as the Prince of Peace. When the angels announced his birth nineteen hundred and thirty-six years ago they proclaimed, "peace on earth. good will among men." In one of the epistles of the apostle Paul, the greatest exponent of Christianity, he says: "I exhort, therefore, first of all, that supplications, prayers, intercessions, thanksgivings, be made for all men; for kings and all that are in high places, that we may lead a tranquil and quiet life"; and the great Apostle Peter in one of his epistles says: "Be subject to every ordinance of man for the Lord's sake whether to the king, as supreme; or unto governors, as sent by him for vengeance on evildoers and for praise to them that do well." The writer has not only urged the Manchurian Christians with whom he is associated to carry out these injunctions of the Word of God, but has so exhorted them in letters written from time to time to the twenty or more Christian groups to which he ministers.

Our observation is that here in this part of Manchuria missionaries and native Christians are seeking to carry out these Christian injunctions. We have found all well-informed Japanese and Manchoukuo officials appreciative of the character and attitude of the native Christians and the purpose and work of the missionaries. In many cases possession of a Bible or New Testament by a Manchurian is all that is needed to convince the authorities that he is a good man and a desirable citizen. At the same time the Japanese and Manchoukuo military and other authorities have given assistance to us in protection in dangerous localities, and in providing means of communication.

People Responsive

5. We have never found the people in North Manchuria more responsive to the gospel message, nor more ready to assume responsibility in church affairs. It is the purpose of the missionaries to establish indigenous churches, able to govern themselves, to pay all their expenses, and to become independent of the missionaries' help. Many of the churches in Japan have now reached this development: as also in some parts of China, where Christianity was introduced early; and in Korea, where the people have shown considerable ability to carry on of themselves in church affairs.

We rejoice to say that some of the Manchurian churches in this part of the world have also become indigenous. This gives satisfaction to the missionary, for we look forward with great hops to the time when we will be no longer needed; when it will not be necessary for us to shoulder financial and other responsibilities for the weak Christian groups, be called upon to solve their problems, suffer the inconveniences of travel and other hardships, but be able to return to our native lands with the assurance and confidence that the Christian churches can carry on of themselves. Nothing so rejoices us as to see Manchurian Christians not only developing into splendid christian characters, but also as church leaders, and groups becoming indigenous organizations. As true missionaries we are ever seeking to keep in the background, the native Christians being encouraged to the fore as leaders of their own churches and other Christian organizations.

It is gratifying that Japanese churches are sending missionaries into China and Mongolia, as well as into Manchoukuo, as representatives of the churches of Korea. When the Russian people are able to assert the spiritual longings of their hearts for real evengelical Christianity, missionaries will be going into Russia, not only from Europe and North America, but also from Japan, Korea, China and Manchoukuo.

Universal Religion

6. As Christianity is the one universal religion and meets the needs of the hearts of people of all classes, tribes and nations, so we see Christianity here in Manchuria also fulfilling the same purpose. Nothing in the history of mankind has been more striking than the changes which the gospel of Christ has brought among cannibals and others, who now clothe themselves, treat their wives and children with consideration, have their own homes, schools and churches. Here in Manchuria, as in other lands, we have seen drunkerds reformed, gamblers reclaimed, opium smokers able to give up their terrible habit, the unclean made pure, and bandits changed into lawful citizens by the power of the gospel and the regenerating Spirit of God. And we see, as well, this same gospel meeting the heart longings of the most intelligent of all nations abroad and here in this part of the world.

In this connection it may be recalled that one distinct feature of the Christian religion is its reasonable presentation of a hope in immortality. The real happiness of a people depends largely upon this During our recent trip across Russia two indellible impressions were made upon us. The first was the dire material poverty of the people. But that which impressed us most was the lack of happiness among them. One did not see those happy greetings, glad handshakes or other forms of welcome, joy and gladness, as seen in other parts of the world; but there was evident a feeling of mental and spiritual depression. Russians boarding our car in Russia did not explain this lack of happiness as due to poverty, but acknowledged that it was because the people were being taught that when man dies he dies as a dog, that he has no soul and that there is no hope beyond the grave.

Believe In Immortality

It is gratifying to find that the Manchurian people believe in immortality, and that there is among them a longing for something better. However, this realization that after all "man does not live by bread alone," and that there is a personal, living God and a future, still burns, we are glad to say, in the hearts of many in Russia. Those Soviets with whom we talked on the train stated that only with their lips could they say.. "There is no God," because this is what they are supposed to believe and sometimes forced to say; but acknowledged that in their hearts they still believe, not only in God but in Christ as Lord and Savior—in a life of happiness beyond the grave for the righteous, and one of retribution and punishment for the wicked.

So we really find the human heart the same the world over. It is a privilege to have a small share in giving the people of North Manchuria the religion of the Lord Jesus Christ, which, we rejoice to say, is proving more and more to be the "power of God unto salvation" to many, and is making of them better citizens, possessing greater value and blessing to their communities.

Hauptmann Pleads For A Truth Test

opinion in this case to take a test with a so-called Lie Detector, Serum or whatever Science may offer.

I hope for myself and in the course of justice, that is my wish, may inspire Dr. Condon to do the same. I have a deep interest in what kind of force made him change his saying. Because when he was visiting me in my Flemington cell, he said all excited to the Prosecutor—"I cannot testify against this man."

I hope that I went not too far in my writing or have overstep any regulations, but I assume your Excellence will understand my feelings.

I plea to your Excellence to give my report your favorable consideration. It certainly will inspire other persons, especially Dr. Condon to do also. I only fighting for my honor and against the disgrace of my family.

My highest admiration and thanks for you Excellence decision.

Very Respectfully,

B. RICHARD HAUPTMANN.

N. J. States Prison.

Governor Hoffman made public the letter only after he had conferred with Chancellor Luther A. Campbell, whose opinion he asked on the advisability of making the letter public.

Not long after his conviction Hauptmann informed his lawyers tha he would be glad to submit to the lie detector test but, except in casual conversation with them, he made no further comment about it. His letter to the Governor is the first actual move he has made to take the test.

Dr. Condon Told of Request

Dr. Condon was informed of Hauptmann's proposal that he would take the same test in Lynn, Mass., last night, where he is appearing in a theatre several times daily, according to The Associated Press.

After the early evening performance he attracted a large throng when he appeared in a furniture store window. In a short interview he laughed at the suggestion in Hauptmann's letter.

"Let him take truth tests if he wants to," Dr. Condon was quoted as saying. "Who'll be in the box with him, Lloyd Fisher? Lloyd's a nice boy, you understand."

"I think I've already submitted to about everything except death. I know I told the truth and that's all there is to it. I am not on trial. I have no statement to retract, exchange or change.

"If Hauptmann has anything to say to me, let him say it," Dr. Condon remarked, according to The Associated Press. "Why doesn't he speak to me? He could write me a nice little letter so I'd know what he wants from me."

Mr. Hauck, at his home in Clinton, N. J., recalled last night the circumstances of Dr. Condon's visit to Hauptmann in the jail.

"He wanted to sit beside Hauptmann just as he had sat beside 'John' in the Bronx when he was arranging about the ransom and for the return of the baby," Mr. Hauck said. "He sat beside him and talked about the same things with him and when he got through he turned to Attorney General Wilentz and myself and said: 'That is the man.'"

Pleas to Pardon Court Planned

Hauptmann's three attorneys, Egbert Rosencrans, C. Lloyd Fisher and Judge Frederick A. Pope, after a conference in Judge Pope's office in Summerville, N. J., announced that their client would "apply for relief" from the death sentence to the Court of Pardons, of which Governor Hoffmas is a member. They expect to have the plea ready for presentation within two weeks.

Mr. Rosencrans said Hauptmann's willingness to submit to the "lie detector" and "truth serum tests was known to them and that they approved, although they did not know that he had written to the Governor.

"We shall confer about this also, and if Hauptmann wants to do it, we shall apply to the court for permission," he said.

The lie detector and serum, as used in Illinois, Wisconsin and Pennsylvania within recent months, have caused divided opinions as to their value among lawyers and jurists. Both are the result of research at Northwestern University under the direction of Dr. Leonard E. Keeler.

Arriving in Japan in 1900, Dr. Tenny soon gave evidence of unusual administrative ability and throughout his thirty years here, he contributed yreatly to the work of the Mission as a whole. In 1918 he was made the Mission Secretary, a position which then entailed crushing responsibilities in connecton with both church and school work. During most of his life in Japan, Dr. Tenny was directly connected with educational work, much of the time as professor of Greek and New Testament in the Theological Department of Tokyo Gakuin.. Later, when the school was moved to Yokohama and reorganized under the name of Kanto Gakuin, his was the heavy task of founder and first president. Under his able direction, Kanto Gakuin made remarkable progress and now has an enrolment of nearly 1,400.

Filipinos Able To Rule Themselves

Secretary Of War Talks To Commonwealth Club Of Calif.

Serene confidence in the ability of the people of the Philippine Islands to govern themselves was expressed by George H. Dern, Secretary of War, in a recent address to the Commonwealth Club of California on the subject, "Phillippine Independence," according to a recent San Francisco dispatch of the Christian Science Monitor.

Secretary Dern has just returned from the Philippine Islands where he represented President Roosevelt at the inauguration of the commonwealth government.

In tracing the history of the islands from their discovery by the Portuguese navigator, Fernando Magellan, more than 400 years ago, to the time they were taken over from Spain by the United States, Secretary Dern spoke of the more than 100 revolts against Spanish rule, 30 of them major ones; of the insurrection against the United States Government under the patriot, Aguinaldo—all has evidence of the people's desire for independence.

Assumed the Burden

Secretary Dern spoke with much pride of the part of United States has had in the evolution of self-government in the Philippines. "We did not take the islands with any thought of territorial aggrandizement," the Secretary said. "Wisely or unwisely we had assumed the burden of ruling the Philippines. We said the islands belonged to the Filipinos."

After the three years of military government, during which peace and order were established, roads were built, sanitary measures put into force, a civil government was set up. Then, during the administration of President Wilson, the Jones Act was passed which made the entire Philippine Legislature elective.

"This act can only be construed as a definite promise of absolute freedom, and gave such a large measure of self-government that it was related to the United States only through the executive department," said the Secretary. "The Filipinos rose magnificently to their responsibilities. Schools were established, good roads extended and free access to our markets enabled them to prosper marvelously."

For Complete Freedom

The next step was the Tydings-McDuffy Act for complete freedom. "By virtue of this act there has been set up what is known as the Commonwealth Government of the Philippines," said Secretary Dern. "This gives almost complete autonomy. The people elect their own President, Vice-President and members of their Legislature, consisting of a single house instead of two."

"At the inauguration of the Commonwealth Government, I read the proclamation of the President of the United States, declaring that the President, Manuel L. Quezon, and Vice-President, Sergio Osmena, and the members of the House (giving their names) had been duly elected. It was then declared that the old Government was at an end."

Three important things have been brought out by the steps by which self-government has been established in the Philippines, the Secretary said. These are:

The United States is keering its word to give the Philippines independence.

The American record in the Philippine Islands, in spite of the mistakes and vicissitudes, has been creditable.

Due to Filipinos

Main credit is due to the Filipinos themselves. In their passion for independence they have shown great courage, fortitude and tenacity of purpose.

"Under the terms of the Tydings-McDuffy Act, independence is not yet complete," Secretary Dern said, "and the islands will remain under American sovereignty for another 10 years.

"The 10-year transition period was deemed wise and prudent, principally to enable the Philippines to make the necessary readjustments in their economic life.

"We reserve certain powers, namely, direct supervision and control over their foreign affairs, and, in general, the right to intervene in case of serious disorders or failure of the commonwealth government to meet its obligations.

Voluntary Surrender

"The philosophy of the independence act is that we are voluntarily surrenderinig a valuable dependency to its inhabitants and launching a new democratic nation. Who says there is nothing new under the sun? History is replete with stories of conquest and of struggles for freedom, but examples like this are rare indeed.

"May we never falter in putting human rights, human liberties and human welfare above all selfish ambitions, individually or nationally, at home or abroad, and thereby help to make the world safe through democracy, which may, after all, be more to the point than making the world safe for democracy."

Monarchists Plan Vote Drive In Spain

Will Run Their Own Candidates Everywhere In March After Split With Clericals

Encouraged by the result of the plebiscite in Greece which restored the monarchy, Spanish royalists have begun preparations for an intensive campaign before the general election in March.

The importance of elections in Spain is apparent when it is recalled that the ballot box overthrew the monarchy and brought the republic in 1931 without a shot being fired.

Now the Monarchists hope they can come back through the same door through which they made their exit according to the New York Times. Instead of joining forces, as they did in the general election of November, 1933, with the Clerical party, headed by Jose Maria Gil Robles, they will put their own candidates in the field everywhere in the forthcoming election.

The split between the Monarchists and the Clericals dates back to the post-election conversion of the Catholic party to republicanism, advocated by the Vatican itself.

The royalists undoubtedly helped the Catholic Popular Actionists to elect more Deputies to the Cortes in 1933 than any other party. Now the Monarchists want to see how great their own voting strength in the country is with all their candidates pledged to restoration of the Bourbon dynasty.

The royalist press publishes the following accurate statistics, which are considered to repudiate the republican regime:

"The second republic is 54 months old. In that period there have been:

"Two Parliaments.

"Twenty-seven Cabinets.

"Eighty-three Ministers.

"Seventeen political parties competing for power.

"A class revolution that caused more than 2,500 deaths.

"Seven minor anarchist uprisings.

"More than 9,000 strikes by organized Socialist labor.

"Five prolongations of the annual budget.

"An increase of 2,000,000,000 pesetas in governmental expenditures annually.

"More than 200 churches and convents burned.

"The city of Oviedo virtually destroyed by Socialist revolutionists, including the razing of the university and the burning of its library of 80,000 volumes.

"An increase of 700,000 in unemployment.

"One hundred and fourteen newspapers suppressed."

Worst Fog In 10 Years Chokes British Traffic

Fog which the Automobile Association said was the worst in ten years paralyzed Great Britain's land, sea and air traffic over an area of 200 miles on December 23 from London to Lancashire and Wales.

Snow, too, helped paralyze last-minute Christmas shopping and caused many accidents.

London was completely blacked out by the fog, says the New York Times. Many bus services were abandoned and home-bound workers struggled in jammed subway trains. Londoners suffered from "fuzzy tongue," the result of breathing not only fog but smoke and soot from a million chimneys.

Shipping on the Thames, Mersey and Clyde was at a standstill.

Six skaters drowned when the unusual sight of frozen ponds and lakes tempted thousands to try the ice.

Weather experts forecast the oldest Christmas of the century.

Cameramen Show New Values In Varied Films

A little girl, Oume, is travelling with her father, a monkey entertainer. He dies suddenly leaving her alone. She is taken care of by a kind-hearted man who proven to be her grandfather. When she grows up she falls in love with Kennosuke, her cousin, acted by Yataro Kurokawa. He is obliged to marry a wealthy girl. The ceremony is over, but his love for Oume is too strong, and he runs away with her. Fate is against them and they end their lives by jumping into the sea.

This picture shows interesting customs on Sado Island, especially the manner in which Obon is celebrated in the dance.

Picture based on Novel

One of Nikkatsu's most ambitious attempts in recent months is "Theater of Life," part of which was exhibited at the recent motion picture contest. It is the first installment of the picturization of a novel, and is one of the best produced photoplays Nikkatsu has shown for sometime.

The plot deals with a gambler in Aichi Prefecture and his son Hyokichi. The life of the boy is seen, his childhood love affair, school days, and finally his university career in Tokyo.

Isamu Kosugi acts in the double role of father and grown up son, taking both parts with skill. The father borrows money to keep Hyokichi at the university, and when he cannot repay he shoots himself. Hyokichi returns to the old home, meets Orin, his playmate in childhood, who has become an elegant geisha and mistress of a Member of Parliament.

The picture ends as Hyokichi accompanied by his mother and a faithful friend of his father leave the country to begin a new existence in the city. But the film has made such a strong impression, and the characters are so full of interest that the next Nikkatsu picture dealing with the adventues of Hyokichi in Tokyo will be eagerly awaited by filmgoers.

U.S. Bridge Team Beats French Four

Champions Of Europe Lose By 94,440 To 97,250 In 300 Hands At New York

In a Madison Square Garden spectacle in which fifty-two ushers bearing seven-foot playing cards acted out the details of a contract bridge game with verve and accuracy, the Four Aces on Dec. 23 defeated the champions of Europe in the wind-up of their 300-hand match, winning a mythical world's title by 2,810 points.

The crowd which watched the manipulations of the huge cards through eight deals was estimated at varying totals, but veteran guessers at the Garden set it at about 1,000 according to the New York Times.

The Garden box office reported that 1,500 tickets, including complimentaries, had been distributed. The Four Aces themselves seemed happy at all anybody at all would pay $3.30 to watch a bridge game.

The human card deck was directed by Geoffrey Mott-Smith and E. A. Mason, with the assistance at the microphones of Caswell Adams and Richards Vidmer, sports writers. The throng followed the bidding and play with evident interest, groaning when the Americans missed a slam and gasping at the boldness of Michael T. Gottlieb, captain of the Americans, in his play of the last hand of the night.

The spectators enjoyed it when the three of spades jumped out of line as an announcer and bid three spades and again on the last deal when one hand held fourteen cards until the directors got an errant five of clubs back into his niche.

In total points over the entire 300 hands the Aces scored 97,250 points and the French 94,440.

The Four Aces have claimed the championship of the United States by virtue of victories in every major tournament here since the Summer of 1933. At present they hold the Vanderbilt Cup, which they successfully defended this year; the Grand National championship of the United States Bridge Association, which they have also won twice, and the Spingold Trophy of the American Bridge League, an event in which only the cream of the expert class is invited to compete.

Their team is composed of Michael T. Gottlieb, captain; David Burnstine, Howard Schenken and Oswald Jacoby. Throughout most of the match, which has continued for nine sessions at Essex House, there have been substitutes in the line-up for Jacoby. Illness prevented him from taking part in the match up until Saturday night.

The team of Parisians opposing the Aces—Baron Robert de Nexon, captain; Pierre Albarran, one-time Davis Cup tennis star; Georges Rousset, Sophocle Venizelos, son f the former Greek Premier, and Emmanuel Tulumaris—boast no long tenure as a championship team. All fine players in the card clubs of Paris, they formed a team to enter the European championships held in Brussels in June. They won out over twelve other nations.

WPA Adds Five Billion Dollars To U.S. Wealth

Hopkins Also Says Advantage Of Work Program Over Direct Relief Shown

The physical wealth of the United States will be increased at least $5,000,000,000 as the result of the construction now being carried out under the Work Relief program, Harry L. Hopkins, WPA Administrator, estimated on December 13. Of this amount, he said, $3,585,000,000 will represent the actual construction value of projects and the remainder the increase in property values and productive capacity.

Mr. Hopkin's computation was based upon figures supplied by WPA statisticians, says a New York Times report. The totals were compiled after $4,007,000,000 of the $4,880,000,000 work and direct relief fund voted by Congress had been alloted.

It was revealed that in addition to the sum allocated, $220,000,000 had been used to repay impounded PWA funds expended before the program got under way and that the remaining $653,000,000 is earmarked for specific purposes.

Highway's Effect is Told

Federal funds totaling $3,000,000,000 have actually been allotted for construction projects, according to the WPA figures given Mr. Hopkins that day. Added to this Federal construction fund was $585,000,000 representing local contributions to PWA projects and $200,000,000 representing similar aid to WPA construction.

From the total of $3,735,000,000 was deducted $60,000,000, representing the "white collar" part of the WPA program; $53,000,000, representing a 5 per cent differential on labor costs over private construction costs, and $37,000,000 for the National Youth Administration program.

A report received from Robert J. Dunham, Illinois WPA administrator, declared that land values along the farm-to-market roads being surfaced would increase about 15 per cent.

River Dredging Is Cited

Taking into account the results of dredging on the upper Mississippi and Missouri Rivers, increase in land values near city WPA developments, the draining of swamps and other such factors, Mr. Hopkins declared that "a conservative estimate" indicated that another $1,500,000,000 could be added to the $3,585,000,000 of construction "wealth" being produced by the program.

"This demonstrates the value of work relief, as opposed to the waste of direct relief," Mr. Hopkins declared.

The figures, he explained, did not include the value of censuses being carried out under the "white collar" program, the "permanent worth" of Rexford G. Tugwell's resettlement program, the production of braille books for the blind, the construction of another foundation for crippled children like that at Warm Springs, and similar enterprises.

Say Labor Gets 80 Per Cent

"In traveling about the country," Mr. Hopkins said, "I have become convinced that people are beginning to realize that the work program is going to show worthwhile results.

Italy Hails 95 Mothers Of 616 Living Fascists

Italy's ninety-five most prolific mothers, married within the last ten years and having 616 living children, were received in audiences by Premier Benito Mussolini and Pope Pius XI in Rome on Dec. 21.

Il Duce gave money and prizes to the women, who turned over to him their wedding rings for Italy's gold reserve, says the New York Herald Tribune. Pope Pius blessed the women.

Whiskers Got Him Job

Conrad Reichley, 73, vowed in 1932 he would let his whiskers grow until a Republican sat again in the White House.

Now he has a long, billowing beard beneath a pair of ruddy cheeks and sparkling, merry eyes.

The Logan Chamber of Commerce said "Reichley is just the man to be our Santa Claus."

He presided in a specially built igloo on Court House Square in Logan, Ohio, during the Christmas season, says the New York Times. The authenticity of his whiskers, in an age of cotton-bearded departmentstore Santas, has impressed Hocking County youth, the Chamber of Commerce reports, with the importance of being good.

Reichley lays his position to the New Deal, but adds, militantly:

"I look the part better than any Democrat."

Badly Handicapped

An old-time Democrat who blinks at his Party's program, wondering what it is all about, says he feels like the venerable clerk at one of the Oxford University chapels. Some graduates stopped in at the chapel and seeing that the oldtimer was still hanging on, remarked that he must have seen many of the great preachers in his day.

"Indeed I have," replied the oldtimer.

"I have heard them all, and thank God I am a Christian still."—Boston Globe.

Price Control For Australia Aids Recovery

Producers Allowed To Sell Dairy Products And Fruit Above World Prices

Australia's comparatively rapid recovery from the depression is attributed chiefly to the fact that it has been able, by various methods, to limit whatever deflation has been caused by the unprecedented fall in export prices, according to the Christian Science Monitor.

These methods include the organized marketing schemes which have assisted producers of butter, cheese, milk, dried fruits, eggs, rice, and wine grapes to overcome the disadvantage of low world prices by obtaining on the home market a reasonable price somewhat above world parity. If world parity had remained the effective price for domestic consumption, thousands of farmers must have been ruined, and many storekeepers, merchants and traders must have gone down with them.

Stabilization Schemes

These marketing, or so-called stabilization, schemes have been operated by states passing legislation supplemented by Commonwealth legislation, and ever since the plans were initiated, the power of the Commonwealth Parliament to pass that legislation has been the subject of divided legal opinion.

Some of the best legal authorities are of the opinion that such legislation is invalid under Section 92 of the Commonwealth Constitution, which provides that trade between the States must be absolutely free.

But several years ago the High Court of Australia, the highest tribunal in Australia, ruled that the legislation of the Commonwealth was valid. It gave a similar ruling this year, but the judges indicated that they would like an appeal taken to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, London, the final arbiter on Dominion constitutional questions.

Control of Marketing

The High Court's more recent judgment was given in a case, James vs. the Commonwealth Government. This litigation referred to the Dried Fruits Act, and the point at issue was whether the Commonwealth had power to require a merchant to market a proportion of his dried fruit output overseas when he desired to place it on the Australian market, where higher prices prevailed.

The court unanimously disallowed the claim of a fruit merchant of Adelaide that the Dried Fruits Act was beyond the powers of the Federal Parliament, and therefore invalid. The appellant, before the Privy Council, will contend that the Commonwealth legislation constrained his freedom of trade contrary to the Federal Constitution. The Commonwealth and supporting states will contend that the Commonwealth legislation is valid and effectual.

Another appeal refers to the powers of states to regulate transport of goods by road from one state to another, when this transport competes with the state-owned railways.

The New South Wales Government considers the issues in these appeals so important that it is sending Atty. Gen. Harry E. Manning to London to appear before the Privy Council when the appeals are heard early this year.

Conflicting Decisions

"In these cases," said the Premier of New South Wales, Bertram S. Stevens, in explaining the Government's decision, "final decisions will be given on several matters which have been for some years the subject of conflicting judicial opinion.

"The matters relate to the Commonwealth power to regulate interstate trade, and also the extent of the State power to regulate transport. Uncertainty exists as to the Commonwealth power to enact certain laws supplementing State laws, whereby primary producers are enabled to set up organizations to conduct the marketing of their products, and to secure home consumption prices.

"It is hoped to establish once and for all the constitutional right of the Federal Parliament to legislate in support of the various State marketing organizations. It is of vital importance to the States to secure a decision which will validate the existing schemes relating to butter, cheese, and dried fruits, and the proposed scheme relating to wheat."

Private traders, who opposed Government control of commerce, are financing the appearance to the Privy Council, and hope thereby to obtain a decision which will enable them to cast off fetters which the Commonwealth and States Governments have put on normal trading in the interests of the producers of the goods concerned.

The Dunbar Curfew

The day of the curfew passed into oblivion long ago, but there is in Bristol, Conn., atop the Dunbar Brother factory, an old bell that rings 99 times every night of the year promptly at 9 o'clock. It is said that Col. Edward L. Dunbar wanted the bell to ring 100 times each night, but this was impossible because with the first pull of the bell there was one stroke and then two strokes with each additional pull. For 65 years it has been pealing out its 99 strokes, and the founder's will say it shall continue to ring just so.

Treasury and how to let the needy starve.

Balance Sheet

In the Spring of 1933, if you and I had made a national balance sheet, we would have found that if we had added up the values of all of the property of every kind in the United States owned by American citizens, the total of these values, which we would call assets, would have been exceeded by the figure representing the total of all the debts owed by the people of the United States. In other words, at that time our national balance sheet, the wealth versus the debts of the American public, showed that we were in the red.

Today, less than three years later, it is a fact that the total of all the debts in the United States is lower than it was then. Whereas on the other side of the picture, you and I know that the values of property of all kinds—farms, houses, automobiles, securities and every other kind of property—have increased so greatly since 1933 that today we are once more in the black. We were insolvent; today we are solvent.

In this fact most of us find a deep satisfaction. But recovery means something more than getting the country back into the black. You and I do not want just to go back to the past. We want to face the future in the belief that human beings can enjoy more of the good things of life, under better conditions, than human beings ever enjoyed in the past.

American life has improved in these two years and a half, and if I have anything to do with it, it is going to improve more in the days to come. The word "progress" is a better word than "recovery," for it means not only a sound business and a sound agriculture from the material point of view, but it means, with equal importance, a sound improvement in American life as a result of continuing and forceful effort on the part of our people and, through them, on the part of their government.

I am certain that that is your purpose; and that is why I continue my confidence, my faith, in the people of America.

Strange Experiment In Shanshi Beats Communism At Its Own Game

The world's first commodity dollar has been issued in the province of Shanshi, North China, where a strange experiment in socialization is being conducted under the direction of Marshall Yen, who is using his personal fortune to get the experiment going.

Mr. Sterling Fisher Jr., Far Eastern editor of the New York Times, so declared in addressing the Pan Pacific club Friday. He said the experiment, which he saw at work, is so close to communism that there should be no reason why communism should take effect at all there.

Mr. Fisher, a young man, lived in Japan seven years following graduation from college. He has just returned to Japan after a trip to Manila and China. Discussing the experiment of Marshal Yen, he said:

"Marshal Yen had heard that probably pressure would be brought to bear on him, so he instituted a tremendous socialization program, or rather he speeded up the program instituted two years and planned to take ten years to complete, with other additional features as well. What he was doing was administering an anti-toxin into Shansi, something so close to communism that there should be no reason why communism should take effect at all there.

"The first part of the program was the exappropriation of all farm land in the province. He had planned this scheme over several years, but decided to call together the landlords and farmers and to put the plan into effect immediately. The system calls for the purchase by the villages of all neighboring farm lands, the issuance of bonds which do not bear interest and will be refunded in 10 or 15 years' time. The price of the land is about 100 Mexican dollars per acre, and therefore involves about one billion Mexican dollars for the purchase of the land. It is being spread throughout the province so that within thirteen months from now every acre of farm land in that province will be publicly owned and lease to the farmers. The farmers used to pay 70 per cent of their income in rent—henceforth they will pay only 20 per cent. In addition the villages will be required to provide employment for all persons needing a job. If a farmer has a large family and insufficient income from his farm, employment must be found for his wife and children. Each farmer will have enough land to provide 200 Mexican dollars income. If the family is very large only the same amount of land will be given, but work will be provided.

"But the most advanced part of Yen's program is industrial, though it is not known at all outside the province. He has 22 factories operating in the city of Taiyuan alone, and it is the aim for the province to own all productive capacity. He has made good headway in two years. The factories already organized include cotton and woollen textiles, for which they grow some cotton and all the wool, steel plants, dye works, electrical equipment factories, farming implements factories, plants for the extraction of products from the abundant coal. I visited a number of the factories, but there was one set up in the arsenal. Half of the arsenal was cleared of its machinery for making ammunition, and that place was devoted to industrial production. Yen is trying to demonstrate that Shansi can be utterly self-sustaining, purchasing virtually nothing from the outside world. He is manufacturing such things as finger nail clippers, tracing instruments for surveyors, electrical equipment, ploughs, electrical station clocks, and all manner of things which are not going to be sold for along time.

"All these industries are subsidied, and all are losing money. Marshall Yen's own relatives are the leading lights in the industries, which calls to mind the old Chinese proverb that if a man gets a good government job he can support a family of 200 for a year.

"In the woolen mills they are making good quality products, such as fine blankets, but obviously they are not making money, and doing it with more labor than is needed, but Yen is trying to get the industry going.

"I met the Vice Governor from whom I learned that they are planning to issue commodity currency. About a million dollars are now in circulation, and these will supplant all other currencies. It is being put into circulation through the government stores selling Shansi manufactured products. People go to these stores and are told that if they use the special currency they will be given 5 per cent reduction on anything they buy. In this way they are getting the people to like the new money. I had one of these dollar notes, the world's first commodity dollar, but sent it to New York. The commodity dollar is based on wheat, and in future will be based on coal, cotton, wheat, and wool, the four major products of the province.

"The difficulties are obvious. What about fluctuation prices? Prices are going to be fixed for everything, and in future this will apply to exports and imports. The commodity dollar in really tremendous in its effect on the province's economic life, for it means fixed prices to the farmer, and for everything coming in and going out. The chances are that they will lose much money in manipulating the exports and imports, until they learn how to maintain a steady level. The government in this program is going to purchase its major imports and sell them to the retail merchants. To carry on this work the province will set up an equilization fund in Tien'sin.

"That briefly covers the whole agricultural and industrial life of the province, based on the four major commodities, and it will later be extended to the whole economic life. It is an advanced type of economic control."

Viscount Inouye presided and Count Aisuke Kabayama spoke of his recent trip to the United States and England. He said that despite unemployment, he thought America was the happiest country in the world. The meeting was closed with violin selections by Kanshu Wanifouchi.

Only One Income In U.S. Topped $5,000,000 In '34

Only one person in the United States had a net taxable income of more than $5,000,000 in 1934, and this was between $6,000,000 and $9,000,000, the United States Internal Revenue Bureau figures showed in December.

Six classes of net income were grouped to conceal identity.

Four had incomes between $1,500,000 and $2,000,000, one between $3,000,000 and $4,000,000, and one over $5,000,000. Their total was $18,035,892.

If the persons in the first five classes had the maximum figure, the highest-income man had a net income of over $6,000,000; if the first five had the minimum, the sixth would have a net income of over $9,000,000 says the New York Times.

In 1933 there had been only one net income of more than $5,000,000, but in the boom peak year of 1929 thirty-eight persons had such an income.

Collection Drive a Factor

In 1934 thirty two individuals had net incomes of $1,000,000 or over, these totaling $56,659,000, against forty-six for 1933 with incomes of $81,559,000. The million-incomes in 1929 were reported at $1,212,098,789.

Authorities called attention to what they regarded as a tendency toward something of a redistribution of wealth, with the great reduction in the million-income returns as compared with the lesser drop in the smaller incomes.

It was admitted, however, that the comparative figures must be viewed from the standpoint of the difference in tax rates and practices between 1929 and 1934.

Japan-Manchu Year Book Has 4 New Chapters

countries, that is, the Dutch East Indies, the Philippines, Oceania, etc., the latest statistics indicate that these regions took less than 4 per cent Japan's total exports.

As for imports, over 36 per cent came from the North American continent, less than 36 per cent from Asia, 13 per cent from Europe, 9 per cent from Oceania and three per cent from Africa. South American imports constituted only one per cent of Japan's total imports, according to the Japan-Manchoukuo Year Book.

One notes, in going through the book, that considerable improvement has made in the setting up of the work. The style, also, is easier to follow, and as far as information is concerned, it is doubtful whether any other volume of its kind contains as much.

Difficult Task

More and more as time passes and the relations between Japan and Manchoukuo become more intimate does one realise the foresight of the publishers in putting the two countries together in the Year Book. This was, naturally, a very difficult task to undertake but it has been well worth the while. Very efficiently has the editor done the important job.

To understand the true worth of having Japan and Manchoukuo together in a year book, one need merely read the chapter on the economic relations between the two countries. As the year book states, Japan has, for over half a century, looked to Manchuria to solve part of her economic requirements. Rich in natural resources, spacious in area, comparatively scant in population, Manchoukuo forms a striking contrast to the situation obtaining in Japan.

The Japan-Manchoukuo Year Book estimates the Japanese investments in Manchoukuo at 2,250,000,000 yen. The largest investments have, naturally, been in railways amount to over 400,000,000 yen, followed by municipal undertakings, coal mines, harbors, etc. That such investments will continue to grow at an even greater pace, inspite of Japan's financial difficulties, is an assumption that holds firm ground when viewed from the standpoint that the Island Empire has consistently shown ability to invest in Manchuria even in the midst of the financial stringencies of the past, the year book notes.

Denies Ship Canal Will Hurt Florida

Geologist Board Says Water Supplies Will Not Be Affected, Nor Crops Impaired

The Florida ship canal will not have an adverse effect upon municipal water supplies or impair the agricultural resources of that State, according to a report made to army engineers on Dec. 26 by a special board of geologists and engineers appointed by the U. S. War Department corps of engineers to study geological conditions involved in the canal plan.

Claims that the canal would threaten water supplies have been made by opponents of the canal project, who have referred to past geological surveys to support their contentions, says the New York Times. The board named by the army engineers was headed by C. E. Boesch and included Sidney Paige, E. B. Burwell, F. C. Carey and Malcolm Pirnie, all geologists or engineers of high standing.

Their report describes an immense underground reservoir of fresh water lying in the porous rocks and in the subterranean channels underlying the Florida Peninsula. This reservoir in places extends far out under the sea the report says. The line of the canal crosses an area in which water is now being discharged from this reservoir through the St. Johns and Withlacoochee rivers. The board describes the canal as a mere nick in the western coast line of the pninsula in so far as its relation to water supply is concerned.

"The investigation conclusively shows," the War Department said, "that the excavation of a sea level canal on the route proposed can have no possible effect whatever on the water supply of important centers of population such as Jacksonville, Tampa, Miami, Palm Beach and Orlando, or on the artesian water supplies of Florida. Its only effect will be a drawdown of the ground water level for a distance of not to exceed ten or fifteen miles on either side of the deep cut of the canal.

"While shallow farm wells near the canal will need deepening to maintain their usefulness, the lowering of the ground water is not expected to adversely affect vegetation and crops, even locally. The ground water level is now generally far below the ground surface in the highland through which the cut passes. Salt water entering the canal cannot contaminate the underground fresh water reservoir, as the flow of ground water will be into the canal, and not from the canal into the underground reservoir."

1936 100th Birthday Of Pickwick, Noted Character

thing about Mr. Weller, already suggested and now to be repeated with all possible seriousness. Through him Dickens attained for once to the genuinely and simply pathetic. Dickens was always most moving when he least exerted himself to be so; he failed most signally when he took his coat off to his business. In Pickwick he kept a tight hold on himself and produced scenes truly touching. The moment in which Sam declares himself a prisoner, and the description of the reciprocal attachment between him and his master, rank high, but higher still is the scene between Sam and his father after Mrs. Weller's death. Here both are at their best, but the perfect word is with Mr. Weller.

" 'Susan,' says I—I was took up very short by this, Samivel; I won't deny it my boy—'Susan,' I say, 'you've been a very good vife to me altogether; don't say nothin' at all about it; keep a good heart, my dear; and you'll live to see me punch that 'ere Stiggins's head yet.' She smiled at this, Samivel," said the old gentleman, stifling a sigh with his pipe, "but she died arter all!"

No wonder that Mr. Weller was "took up short." Is there anyone who is not? Dickens's own contemporaries cried freely over the deathbeds of Little Nell and Little Paul and Little Johnnie. To our more dry-eyed generation, which flatters itself rightly or wrongly that it can distinguish the real thing, this scene is not only worth thousands of those others but is unsurpassable in simplicity and dignity. Those who are of this way of thinking have Mr. Cresterton's support, and when he says something about Dickens it would indeed be an impertience to paraphrase it. "Pickwick," he writes, "may be the top of Dickens's humor; I think upon the whole it is. But the broad humor of Pickwick he broadened over many wonderful kingdoms; the narrow pathos of Pickwick he never found again."

U.S. Declared Retreating As Pacific Power

Nicholas Roosevelt Asserts Loss Of Its Position Of Authority Is Inevitable

Surrender of the Philippine Islands by Congress last year has so altered the basis of American policy in the Far East that the withdrawal of the United States from its former position of authority in the Pacific has been made inevitable, Nicholas Roosevelt Vice-Governor of the Philippines in 1930 and former United States Minister to Hungary, said on January 4 at a luncheon discussion of the Foreign Policy Association at the Hotel Astor on the question, "Should Western Powers Get Out of Asia?" according to the New York Herald Tribune.

The other speakers on the program were Sir Arthur Willert, head of the news department of the British Foreign Office from 1920 to 1935, and Nathaniel Peffer, author of several books on Far Eastern questions. Sir Arthur, no longer speaking for the British government, argued against withdrawal of the United States and Europe from the Far East on the ground that it would re-establish the "bad, old dispensation of force" in international relations. Mr. Peffer urged withdrawal as the only alternative to war.

James G. McDonald, honorary chairman of the board of directors of the Foreign Policy Association and former League of Nations High Commissioner for Refugees from Germany, presided at the luncheon, which was attended by about 700 persons.

"I hate to say it," Mr. Roosevelt said, "especially in the presence of foreigners, but we have adopted the policy of scuttle. We have failed to carry the white man's burden. We have, to use Mr. Kipling's famous words, called too loud on freedom to cloak our weariness' with the burden of colonial administration."

Before the end of 1936, he predicted, all naval agreements will have been scrapped, and the powers of the world will have embarked on "unrestricted naval building programs."

"It looks to me," he continued, "as if the way is being paved for Japan to become the leading power in Asia. In a brief time, it may be ten, twenty, or thirty years, there will be a very much larger and more powerful Japanese Empire than today, and Americans as well as British may have cause to regret that we took the first steps to make this possible."

Sir Arthur Willert admitted that England is so concerned at present with affairs in Europe that its policy has become immobilized in eastern Asia. Trade, prestige, and the hope for a system of collective security, however, he advanced as reasons against the withdrawal of either the United States or Great Britain from Pacific affairs.

Hawaii To Build Y70,000 Home At Doshisha 'U'

Peace Scholarship Committee Of Honolulu Member Coming To Put Project Through

An international house estimated to cost ¥70,000 will be established at Doshisha University, Kyoto, by the Friend Peace Scholarship Committee of Honolulu, Hawaii, according to an announcement made on January 15 by the committee of which Dr. David L. Crawford, president of the University of Hawaii, is chairman.

An extensive property lying between the Kyoto Imperial Palace and Doshisha university, comprising an area of over 20,000 square feet with a large building on it was recently purchased for the Friend Peace Scholarship movement. The necessary funds to purchase the property were provided by Mr. and Mrs. Theodore Richards and the Juliette M. Atherton Trust of Honolulu.

After considerable remodelling of the building, the entire premises is to be dedicated to the promotion of international understanding and friendship in Japan. It is contemplated that the Peace Scholarship Fellows, who are sent from Hawaii to Doshisha University to teach English and to study Japanese at the same time, and to perform other friendship services, are to take the leading roles in making this international house a typical Hawaii Center, in Japan. According to the present plan, the building will have ample accommodations for social, religious, and international programs, in addition to a student dormitory on the second and third floors.

In connection with the inauguration of this permanent home for the Friend Peace Scholarship, Colbert N. Kurokawa, a member of the local committee, is to leave for Japan on February 11, to assist the university authorities in Kyoto to complete the plan of operation as well as of inauguration of the center.

productions is Universal's "East of Java," starring Charles Bickford, opening at Nippon Gekijo, February 1. Bickford, cast as an American gangster fleeing from East Africa with "G" men on his trail, champions seven cowering human beings, including a beautiful woman, against seven lions, when a tramp schooner is wrecked on the reefs of a jungle isle a hundred miles from the nearest civilization. This is the film in which Bickford was attacked by a crazed lion and nearly died of his wounds.

In the cast are Elizabeth Young, Frank Albertson, Leslie Fenton, Clarence Muse, and many other noted players of stage and screen. The production was directed by George Melford from the book, "Tiger Island," by Gouverneur Morris, and adapted for the screen by Paul Perez and James Ashmore Greelman.

The story opens with Bickford fleeing the East African port of Simba Sao in the tramp schooner "Sea Dragon," Leslie Fenton, master. The ship is shipping, beside human cargo, a consignment of lions and other jungle beasts, to America. A tropical hurricane sweeps the ship onto reefs, humans and beasts escape to the island, and the fight for the survival of the fittest starts. Hunger, thirst, lack of firewood, fever and jungle insanity follow as the beasts sweep loser and closer to their human prey.

Who survives the gruelling battle is told only in the last part of the last reel. Bickford, in a role that calls for him to be half human, half beast as he fights off his enemies, both human and animal, handles each situation with brute ferocity and force.

One evening returning home he meets with a strange old man who speaks to him and offers to sell him advance news that will appear the next day. He accepts the offer and on reading the news discovers that the head of his business will be taken by the police for fraud, and that a certain horse will win the first prize in the race on following day. He laughs at the information.

But the next day his business chief is taken, and this stimulates him so much that he sells all his possessions to purchase a ticket on the winning horse, and succeeds as was predicted. On his way to meet Kanko in a taxi he reads in the newspaper the report of his death, and orders the taxi driver to go quickly. But a second later when the police order the taxi to stop, the body of Miyamoto is found in the car, and also a large sum of money.

Social and Personal Notes

Society Created In Opposition To Reforms, Opens Exhibition

The Nibukai Art Society, organized a year ago by artists opposed to the reforms made in the Imperial Academy of Fine Arts by the Minister of Education, Mr. Genji Matsuda, has opened its second exhibition at the Mitsukoshi department store, Nihonbashi.

Members of the new society formerly belonged to the Imperial Academy of Fine Arts. They withdrew when a rule was passed that required that they submit their work for examination before exhibiting it. They considered that this was an unfair handicap for artists. No examinations are required by the Nibukai Art Society which they formed in protest.

The present exhibition, which will continue to February 7, consists of the recent oil paintings of almost all the members. Among those exhibiting are: Messrs. Usaburo Ihara, Saburo Ohta, Kijiro Ohta, Kinichiro Ishikawa, Kenkichi Nakamura, Hisashi Tsuji, Toraji Ishikawa, Hiromitsu Nakazawa, Ryutoku Ohno, Katsumi Miyake, Kunisuke Hashimoto, Seiji Kato, Mango Kobayashi, Itaru Tanobe, Takeji Fujishima, Saburosuke Okada, Sanzo Wada, and several other outstanding oil painters.

Among the exhibits, the most interesting are: "On the Sea Shore" by Saburo Ohta, "Girl in Red" by Saburosuke Okada," Courtesan" by Kijiro Ohta, "Pagoda of the Kiyomizu Temple" by Ryutoku Ohno, "Rocky Shore" by Mango Kobayashi, and "Cloud on the Sea" by Takeji Fujishima.

Mr. Saburo Ohta, administration member of the society, declared at the opening of the exhibition:

"The society has been fortified strongly since last autumn. Now we have some 70 members and almost of all members are exhibiting their most recent works. We are not opposing academism but we can not agree to the reform of the Imperial Academy of Fine Arts. The paintings at this exhibition are rather small, but we specially painted for this exhibition to show our recent movement and styles. When we organized this society, some young painters did not understand our aim, but recently they understood our objections and they will show their works at our third exhibition to be held next autumn. We will receive their works at our next exhibition and some members of our society will also exhibit large canvases. Now the Nibukai Art Society is one of the strongest and most active organizations of civil painters."

The exhibition shows the recent activities and form of the artists and we believe that you will find the modern tendencies of the Japanese modern art dominating out the works.—T. Saisho.

Imperial Airways Adds Further Link To Far East Service

Imperial Airways once again are successfully pioneering a new air route, a further link in the chain of British Empire air routes. The second series of experimental flights began in December over the 1700 miles extension to Hongkong of the Imperial main route. They should be completed by the middle of February, says an Imperial Airways announcement.

This second series of flights will follow the same course and timetable schedule as the first six return flights recently completed; a schedule which gives an immediate connection at Penang to and from London and Singapore on the main Empire route.

The Imperial Airways four-engined 'Dorado' leaves Penang on Thursday mornings, staying the night at Saigon, and arrives in Hongkong on Friday afternoon. In the Westerly direction the 'Dorado' leaves Hongkong on Tuesday staying the night in Saigon and arrives in Penang on Wednesdays. Capt. Armstrong, who reports that the first six return flights have proved eminently satisfactory inspite of the unfavorable flying conditions of the time of year, will be handing over the command of the 'Dorado' to Capt. Lock in due course. The combined opinions of the data secured by these two Imperial Airways' Captains, who have an extensive commercial flying experience between them, should prove a very sound basis for the opening of a regular service to Honkong.

Mail and passengers are not being carried on these experimental flights, but it is anticipated that it will not be long before a full and regular service is available to the public, thus bringing Hongkong regularly within 9 days of London. It is not so long ago that this short time would have seemed fantastic.

The start of this second series of experimental flights over the new route emphasises, once again, the Imprial Airways policy of exhaustive research into the safety and practicability of all new projects before their inauguration. To a few impatient people who would accelerate British commercial aviation policies, it is an excellent example of the thoroughness which has enabled Imperial Airways to become one of the outstanding aviation companies in the world judged in terms of the preeminent factor in Commercial Aviation: 'Safety'.

Normandie, Queen Mary Rates To Be Same This Season

Informal conversations were concluded in Paris recently between representatives of the French Line and the Cunard White Star Line by which the Normandie and the Queen Mary will adopt the same rates during the coming season. This involves a reduction by the French Line and reclassification of the Normandie as a cabin ship which will be proposed, it is understood, at the next meeting of the North Atlantic Steamship Conference.

According to the French Line's annual report, made public in Paris in December, the Normandie in her eighteen crossings in 1935 made sufficient to pay for her operating expenses and general costs, but not enough to cover service charges on the loans for her construction, says the New York Times. These unpaid costs will have to be assumed by the government.

The line's annual report says the Normandie carried 18,000 passengers last year, bringing in 50,000,000 francs. Operating costs ere 36,000,000 francs and the balance of 14,000,000 francs covered other costs.

It said that during the Summer de luxe accommodations will cost a minimum of $276, tourist class, $145.50, and third class, $93. There will be some rooms with bath at $304. The best double rooms with bath will be $335; the suites with bedroom, bath and sitting room for two will be $765; three-room suites, $859 for two, and larger suites, $954 for two.

The Cunard White Star Line announced recently that "actual bookings may be made for all sailings of the Queen Mary, with the exception of the de luxe space on the ship's maiden voyage, for which hundreds of applications in excess of the ship's capacity have been received."

The application of the Cunard White Star Line for cabin designation for the Queen Mary is considered a gesture of protest against the rating of the Manhattan and Washington of the United States Lines.

Lindberghs' Privacy Respected In England

of our Imperial Airways."

The Guardian goes on to describe Pan American Airways in connection with various transatlantic air services and with the British firm at Hamble Southampton which is building aircraft of the kind it uses, adding:

Met by British Reporters

'Lindbergh has no connection with this firm, but it will be strange if he doesn't find an outlet for his energies by periodical visits to Hamble."

The Herald Tribune's Paris editor today in a cable from Liverpool refers to the "horde of British reporters" who went to Liverpool to meet the ship in which the Lindberghs arrived, adding that these reporters "intended to follow him all over England until he granted them a direct interview explaining his reasons for leaving the United States."

Nothing, however, of any such alleged threat has appeared in any British newspaper which has so far reached the Monitor's London office although it is quite true that a large number of British reporters and photographers did gather at Liverpool in the ordinary course of their perpetual search for what might give them "copy."

Britain Sees Peril In Neutrality Idea

Is Shocked By Prospects That She Might Not Get U.S. Goods In Wartime

As the implications of the United States Neutrality Bill continued to be studied early this month, it began to dawn upon the people of England that Britain would be placed in the same class with an aggressor in case she should be drawn into military or naval sanctions on behalf of the League of Nations.

Reluctantly and somewhat incredulously the British people began to face the possibility that their emergency supplies of American oil, cotton and other essential materials of war—not to mention loans and munitions—would be cut off if they should be attacked by Italy at the present time or if their empire should be fighting for its life at some future date against a rearmed and aggressive Germany, says the New York Times.

See Neutral Rights Abandoned

For the moment the shock of this discovery has offset much of the satisfaction that might have been felt here over the abandonment of America's historic policy of freedom of the seas. Naturally, the newspapers are glad the United States is formally and legally giving up a policy that nearly brought her into conflict with the Allies early in the World War. But some of them feel the abandonment of neutral rights has been bought at a stiff price.

Perhaps it is a portent of things to come that important emissaries of the Lancashire cotton industry sailed recently for Brazil on a three months' tour of investigation of cotton-growing areas of that country. The declared object of the tour is to persuade Brazilian cotton planters to take more care in the preparation of their raw product for shipment abroad.

The mission assumed added importance, however, in the light of the United States Neutrality Bill, for Lancashire already takes 330,000 bales, or one-seventh of her total annual requirements, from Brazil. Inevitably she will seek still greater sources of supply in Brazil and elsewhere, especially within the empire, if American cotton shipments cannot be relied upon in case of emergency.

The same process of finding alternative sources may be expected to begin in oil, copper and other products that the United States supplies and that would be essential to Britain in a life-and-death struggle.

Many Britons are not at all sure the United States really has abandoned her neutral rights, no matter what President Roosevelt may have said or what the new Neutrality Bill may provide.

The President talked of cutting off abnormal supplies from belligerents, but what will the United States do about its trade with other neutrals? The question is pertinent, for Britain has certainly not abandoned her self-given right to interfere with neutral trade.

Previous War Practice Cited

She did it in the last war and in every great war since she has held command of the seas. If there are any neutrals in the next war it is a safe guess Britain will blockade them and control their imports as she did in the past. Will the United States then, insist on the right to do business with other neutrals? And, if so, is there any way of avoiding those complications that dragged the United States into war nineteen years ago?

These are questions that are sure to be debated for many months to come and the answers may influence British policy profoundly. For the present, however, British commentators are thinking more of the immediate situation than of future emergencies.

"Mr. Baldwin once declared he would never commit himself to an extreme sanctions policy until he knew what the United States was going to do," The Daily Telegraph recalls. "If Congress should endorse the President's policy the British Government will know.

"What is even more to the point is that the League of Nations will also know, if any proposal should be made to extend the present sanctions in connection with the Italo-Ethiopian war.

"Yet there should be no dangerous misconceptions on this side as to what prompted Mr. Roosevelt to take this step. Far from it meaning that the United States is drawing closer to the League, it is proof of a still more complete withdrawal from association and cooperation. It is a retrogression, not an advance.

"There is no hint even of readiness to join in 'consultation' as provided in the Briand-Kellogg Pact. No distinction is attempted between belligerents. The aggressor and his victim stand on precisely the same footing. If any third power should be drawn into the fray by an unprovoked attack, the same conditions will apply. Are they not all engaged in a brawl?

"That may be logical and it may be statecraft, yet we suspect that many American consciences will be sorely troubled.

"Much as we welcome the tacit abandonment of the freedom of the seas, it would be dearly bought at the price of the United States washing its hands of all share of responsibility for the peace of the world unless American material interests are directly infringed. There are nations even in Europe which value peace and liberty as highly as the United States."

The Times of London believes Mr. Roosevelt has been helpful to the League powers in the present crisis and has cleared the way for the League to cut off all oil supplies from Italy. About future conflicts it is not so sure.

Prospect Held Disconcerting

"The prospect that American neutrality is to be applied impartially to all belligerents alike—to the aggressor as well as to his victim—seems disconcerting at first sight," it adds, "although that was only to be expected from the refusal of the great mass of the American people to become entangled in overseas quarrels or to commit themselves to any international organization for mutual security.

"There is a loophole at present, however, in the exception of cases in which 'Congress, with the approval of the President, shall determine otherwise.' More important, perhaps, is the greater freedom which the new neutrality policy will give to the economic discouragement of aggression under the covenant.

"Mr. Roosevelt has expounded with timely and commendable vigor the two ways open to nations of furthering their economic demands. One is the old way, 'by the law of the sword.'

"Britain and the preponderating mass of the nations are adamant against it. It runs counter to every hope—moral and material—of civilization. Yet, equally, Britain is ready to work and treat with any country, whatever its political constitution, which will bring its aspirations, needs and grievances to the test of negotiation and discussion, and it is more than willing to effect progress by agreement.

"It sees the choice as clearly as Mr. Roosevelt and is more determined in its preference than at any time since the war."

Charges Inconsistency

The Morning Post charges Mr. Roosevelt with inconsistency in first castigating dictatorships and then announcing that the United States will keep out of every war, just or unjust, which does not immediately concern her.

"She is of the many who desire peace, but she will cooperate with nobody in curbing the few who want war," says that journal. "That may be a comfortable counsel of safety but how about 'the good neighbor'?"

That paper acknowledges, however, that Mr. Roosevelt has "thoroughly clarified the oil issue so far as Europe is concerned," and says it will no longer be possible for European statesmen, like Premier Laval, to take shelter behind American uncertainties.

The diplomatic correspondent of The Daily Telegraph, who is known to have the confidence of high officials, writes tonight that Mr. Roosevelt's message has made effective oil sanctions by the League impracticable.

Several weeks, ago, he explained, the British Cabinet considered the possibility that the United States would do no more than restrict her exports to normal. The conclusion then reached, he says, was that in such circumstances an oil sanction could not be made effective, especially since Russia, Rumania and Venezuela were expected to adopt a similar attitude.

Routing about two thousand telephone calls a day over her switchboard, it is difficult to believe that Kitty McKeever would even attempt to remember voices. Yet she does, without fail. Miss McKeever, during her fifteen years as Chief Operator, has handled more than 10,512,000 calls with speed and accuracy that is uncanny.

PHI BETA KAPPA HAS DINNER MEETING

The annual meeting and dinner of Phi Beta Kappa in Japan was held at the Japan Industry Club Saturday.

The officers elected for the ensuing year were: Honorary President, Count Kentaro Kaneko; Mr. Y. Fukukita, president; Dr. Iwao F. Ayusawa and Miss Winifred Draper, vice-presidents;. Mr.. Yoshio. Ichikawa and Mr. Glenn F. Baker, secretaries.

"Japan's Contribution to World Culture" formed the subject of the forum which followed the dinner, Mrs. Penlington presiding in place of the president, Mr. Fukukita, who was absent on account of injuries received in an accident.

The chief speakers were Professor Y. Okakura and Dr. Thomas Baty.

Professor Okakura's address was full of quiet humor as he contrasted the ways of life of East and West. He illustrated the cultivation of the inner life in Japan by the customs associated with cha-no-yu and its cult of slow motion. He asked how we could know ourselves without peace of mind, and considered that meditation was a means of reaching happiness. In Japan there was still time for reflection, but the restless West moved at such a pace there was little space for pause or rest.

Dr. Baty in a brilliant address spoke of the impact of Japanese art upon the decorative arts of England in the Oscar Wilde period. He outlined the change that had taken place in the florid and formal art of the period after the introduction of the natural and fresh work of Japanese schools of art.

The speaker gave an interesting glimpse into a large field of activity that is seldom explored and showed the large influence that Japanese artists have exerted upon those of other countries. Dr. Baty in conclusion dwelt upon the sources of strength in Japanese art which continue to give pleasure and instruction to the world.

Other speakers who contributed to the forum were Dr. Schneder of Sendai, Dr. Scherer, Mr. Bradford Smith and Professor T. Kanda.

Those present were Dr. Thomas Baty, Professor Y. Okakura, Dr. David Bowman Schneder, Dr. and Mrs. James A. B. Scherer, Mr. and Mrs. Glenn F. Baker, Dr. Gideon Draper, Mrs. Z. K. KOBE NOTES

The last meeting of the Kobe Women's Club was arranged by Mrs. Stranks, Chairman of the Literary Committee, and took the form of a book review given by Mr. S. M. Hilburn of Kwansai Gakuin who had chosen for his talk, "Mary Queen of Scots" in this case a book by Ant en Zweiz. It was a fascinating subject dealt with in a very interesting and instructive manner by Mr. Hilburn. He reviewed the year from the day she was born to the day when "She stood beside the block, alone".

At sixteen she was Queen of Fortune. But trouble started for her, and she lived through turbulent times—all Europe trying to secure her hand in marriage. She fell in love with and married her cousin Lord Darnley, but the marriage was a ghastly failure. These two years of her life were very important in forming her character. She had a hand in the murder of her husband after which she married her lover Lord Bothwell. The book treats the old subject from a new angle and is very well worth reading, the speaker said.

Before this review Mrs. MacCausland gave a review of current events. This week's program has been arranged by Mrs. Paul Reed, Chairman of the House Problems Committee, it will be a lecture by Mrs. Akana on Child Psychology.

'Frisco's Two Bridges Making Good Progress

Allowance has been made for sidesway set up by winds. At the Golden Gate Bridge the center of the traffic span may move as much as 20ft. without damage to the structure, while at a hypothetical wind velocity of 90 miles an hour the safety factor is still 2.6. A more serious engineering consideration is the effect of expansion and contraction from heat and cold, which may raise and lower the suspension spans as much as 10ft. in the Golden Gate Bridge and a lesser amount in the West Crossing spans. This factor has been found to be of such importance in the manufacture of the cables of the West Crossing that work has to be discontinued for about six hours during the heat of each day; the spinning is kept up for the balance of the 24 hours so that undue time may not be lost. Both bridges will serve as aerial beacons, and the piers are adequately protected by the United States lighthouse service. Provision has been made for the possible utilization of the towers for radio broadcasting. It is interesting to note that each pier and the launches and tugs used in the preliminary construction of the Bay Bridge were equipped with two-way radio to allow for the more efficient distribution of material and labor between the various sectors of the project.

Naturally, with the great expenditure of funds involved in these undertakings, $77,200,000 (£15,440,000) for the Bay Bridge and $33,500,000 (£6,700,000) for the Golden Gate Bridge, it is often asked how they are to be paid for. Both will be toll bridges, superseding the present ferry system of San Francisco Bay, and will be self-liquidating over periods of 35 years for the Golden Gate Bridge and 20 years for the Bay Bridge. The San Francisco-Oakland Bay Bridge is a State project and the bonds were discounted by the Federal Reconstruction Finance Corporation; the Golden Gate Bridge is financed by a private issue of bonds guaranteed by the city of San Francisco and by a group of counties to the north. The cities of the Bay district served by the bridges have at present a population of some 1,500,000. The annual traffic of the Bay Bridge is estimated at 24,000,000 motor-cars, 6,000,000 and 50,000,000 train passengers. The Golden Gate Bridge has similar provisions for vehicular traffic but has no special lanes for trucks or electric railway tracks.

Canada Moves Nearer Change In Constitution

seventy years ago and the division of powers as between the Dominion and the provinces has been a stumbling block—and a costly lawyers' paradise—to the type of modern social legislation embracing an eight-hour day, minimum wages, unemployment insurance and old-age pensions, to which all parties in Parliament are committed. The fathers of confederation were wise in their day and generation, but they could not know of the problems brought by invention and modern communication and the ramifications of modern industry. Least of all could they foresee a day when any one without working could demand a subsidy from the state.

When the autonomy of the Dominions in the British Empire was recognized at the 1926 Imperial Conference in London legislation was drafted and approved at the 1930 conference at which Canada was represented by Prime Minister Bennett. Ontario and Quebec joined in opposing any changes that would alter the method by which the B. N. A. act could be amended. Thus the statute of Westminster made an exception in the case of Canada when it conferred on other Dominions the right to amend their own constitutions.

Tax Law Changes Urged

Canada exercises all other prerogatives of an autonomus nation, holds membership in the League of Nations, negotiates treaties with other countries and completely controls its own internal and external affairs, but at present cannot basically alter its own laws.

One of the chief reasons for a constitutional change is to obtain a clear definition of the taxation rights of the federal and provincial authorities. There has been a great deal of duplication and waste. It has been suggested by provincial premiers that the Dominion should abandon the income tax leaving this impost solely within provincial jurisdictions; that it should continue the sales tax, but split the proceeds earmarked for unemployment relief with the provinces, and that it should assume the costs and machinery of collection of all taxes, as an economy move.

As a basis for framing constitutional changes a lengthy and detailed brief was submitted to the federal-provincial conference in Ottawa last month by Attorney General Arthur Roebuck of Ontario, and this will probably be revised and amended to form the framework of the new constitution.

Paris Sees Danger Without U.S. Aid

Newspapers Reveal Fears Of Probable Loss Of Supplies In Next War With Germany

Almost without exception all comment in French newspapers on Jan 5 and in diplomatic and parliamentary circles on President Roosevelt's message to Congress and on the neutrality bill is far more concerned with whether the neutrality of the United States will be prejudicial to France in time of war than whether it will add strength to the existing machinery for preventing war

What is most striking is that the anti-war aspect of the proposal is almost entirely overlooked, says P. J. Philip in the New York Times, whose article of that date from Paris, continues.

It is remembered, of course, that in the last war the United States was the granary and factory from which enormously valuable and, indeed, essential equipment was derived even before the United States entered the war—largely unpaid for—but so fixed is the French mind in its certainty that war with Germany cannot be prevented that the first immediate reaction of almost all commentators is that new sources of supply must be sought to compensate for what can no longer be expected from America.

Sarcastic on American War

That being the main French preoccupation there is more abuse than comprehension in a great deal of today's comment by those in the press who are supposed to form public opinion. Very few, for instance, abstain from sarcastic citation of the Chaco war as a contradiction of the President's claim that the American continents are more neighborly than Europe.

Where there is satisfaction with the denunciation of the law of force there is also a smug tendency to fit the cap on every other head and especially on Chancellor Adolf Hitler's. What division of opinion—or rather attitude—is to be found follows internal political lines. In the Left newspapers, for instance, there is a more marked appreciation of the President's words than in the Right newspapers, but it is doubtful whether this friendliness is not almost entirely due to the hope that an application of an oil embargo by the United States against Italy and Ethiopia—which does not need oil—will prove unpleasant for Premier Pierre Laval as well as for Premier Benito Mussolini.

Second to the concern as to where France will get her war supplies in the future is concern lest this new American policy will result in giving an enormous increase in strength to Great Britain, with her empire resources behind her, and make her predominant in Europe. That aspect is not entirely agreeable. While it is fully realized that, confronted as she is by dictatorships on almost all her frontiers, France's interest is to remain closely allied to the democratic empire, she has no wish to seem to be in a position of dependence.

The first consequence here of the American neutrality move probably will be the hastening of a tie-up between France and Russia, which has been already prepared in the mutual assistance treaty signed by Mr. Laval last Spring.

For American readers there is much food for thought in a great deal of today's comment, for it does not show great friendliness for American ways of thinking and doing. President Roosevelt, for instance, would scarcely recognize himself in this portrait in the Journal:

"Is it not deliciously ironic to hear autocratic tendencies denounced by a statesman who has pushed autocracy so far as to modify arbitrarily the value of his country's money and to undertake regimentation of the whole national economy?"

The Matin finds that the President, not contented with directed economy, has taken to directing history by ranking Paraguay and Bolivia among the American good neighbors whose noble example should make the people of Europe blush.

Wilson's Attitude Recalled

Emile Bure in the Ordre finds the President's attitude somewhat too closely akin to that of President Wilson at the time of his "too proud to fight" oration. But he, like others, is prepared to hope and believe that, whatever their legal attitude may be, "the American people will never remain dead to the appeal of a just cause."

Wladimir d'Ormesson in the Figaro is less optimistic regarding at least the immediate future. He finds that now, as always, there is a duality in the American attitude, positive in words and negative in action.

"Will not the immediate result be," he asks, "to exasperate those who feel themselves aimed at and excite those who feel themselves encouraged and so produce a dreadful mess which the United States will regard from afar with a perfectly satisfied conscience?"

On the Left side Leon Blum is most approving of the President's words although he, too, finds a contradiction between them and the neutrality bill. He, at least, seeks an explanation of the United States attitude in the fact that Europe has so often discouraged and disappointed American good faith.

But his approval reveals itself finally as somewhat partisan for it derives mostly from his satisfaction in pointing to Premier Laval as principally responsible for the lack of American confidence in the League of Nations as an instrument of peace.

The Quotidien, one of the most independent Paris newspapers, puts the French case against the Neutrality Bill in a fashion which is likely to get general approval here. While praising the President's speech it says:

Perfect Driving

In this day of entirely too much reckless driving, an enviable record of safety at the wheel is that of Miss Eva Jordan, age 66, who has been driving for 14 years—covered more than 1,000,000 miles—and never had an accident. Miss Jordan buys a new car every year and all the 14 cars she has used have been turned in without a dent or scratch on them. Her work is transporting patients to the University Hospital at Iowa City from northeastern Iowa, and whether or not she is accompanied on her many long journeys, she always drives as carefully as when a patient is her passenger.

Tomb of Will Adams and His Wife.
Dr. Scherer's presentation of "Miura Anjin" as a Japanese samurai is thrilling, and his portraiture of that bygone time has the ring of truth. His romance is real history, and I find it far superior to any historical novel of recent years. For he knows the Old Japan at first hand, and has absorbed its atmosphere. Returning to Japan after an interval of six years, Mrs. Nathan was amazed at the extraordinary progress made in the erection of new and modern buildings, the wide roads, and the easy aand good communication everywhere throughout the country. It spoke volumes for the energy and industry of the people that such progress had been achieved in so short a space of time, she declared.

Mrs. Nathan referred to the Goodwill Mission to Australia, under the able leadership of His Excellency Debuchi, and said that his charming personality and sincerity had contributed much to the success of that Mission. New Edition Of Trade Guide Is Up-To-Date pletely revised. One notes an increase also in the size of the book which is crammed full of pertinent information.

Another feature is a comprehensive directory of manufacturers and dealers which accompanies each chapter.

As The Japan Trade Guide states, Japan's favorable position in international trade was fairly well sustained during the first six months of 1935. To quote from the year book, "while the percentage of increase in exports over last year has been reduced, it cannot be denied that Japan's export business has on the whole been able to maintain a favorable position during the entire period under review. An increase of 17 per cent is quite a good record, for it could not be reasonably expected that Japan's trade would continue to show such a phenomenal advance as that record for 1933, when the depreciated yen exchange was reflected in exports in a most remarkable manner."

The compilation of the exhaustive statistical records which supplement the reading matter in the book is certainly an achievement and the publishers of the book may well pride themselves on the excellent manner in which these valuable records are presented. There have been many attempts at getting out a trade guide in this country and one cannot but sympathise with the difficulties encountered by the enterprising people, publishers and editors of such work. The truth of the matter, however, is that until this publication of the Domei Tsushin Sha, there was not, on the market, a single comprehensive, accurate and easily understood economic guide suitable for foreign readers.

Easily Understood

The editors of the Japan Trade Guide had a vast accumulation of facts, gathered undoubtedly from innumerable special sources, to set orth, correlate and expound. They ave done a difficult task in a praiseworthy manner, with results that will be found valuable. The style of the ook is such that it is easily understood by those not so well informd on trade conditions in this country and so should prove its value to the layman as well as to the student of conditions in this country. Undoubtedly the sending of such a trade guide to foreign countries, particularly to the United States, England and to continental Europe will go a long way to bring about a better understanding of the actual state of affairs in this country and thus clear some very dangerous misconceptions about Japan's trade methods.

It may also be added that appendixes to the Japan Trade Guide, of translations of the Japanese Customs Tariff Law and Schedule, and of laws governing patents, trade marks and other industrial rights would render conveniences to the foreign readers who may be interested in trade with Japan.

Italy Is Suffering Under Sanctions; Grumbling Heard

Social Life Wanes And Night Life Vanishes As Cities Gloomy After Dark

The second month of sanctions is drawing to a close without any visible sign of a weakening in the Italian determination to see things through to the end, says Arnaldo Cortesi in a despatch from Rome to the New York Times in January 5. Complaints, grumblings and criticisms of some detail or other of the government's policies are heard sporadically here and there, but they are not intense enough or widespread enough to be taken as evidence of any substantial change in italian public opinion, he adds. His article continues:

Most persons go on the principle that now that Italy finds herself in a tight corner it is the duty of all citizens to support the government without asking any questions and that there will be time enough for discussion and recriminations when the crisis is over. Although many classes of the population undeniably are suffering, Premier Benito Mussolini has neither lost popularity nor forfeited the unhesitating support of the Italian people, for the sanctionist powers and particularly Britain are convenient scapegoats upon which the blame can continue to be shifted for all Italy's troubles.

Social Life Wanes

Superficially there is little change in Italian life since sanctions began. There is a notable decrease in the number of motor cars in circulation because of the unnaturally high price at which gasoline is now selling. Shops, hotels and restaurants are less crowded than they used to be, fewer persons are seen wearing fashionable or expensive clothes and social life is at a low ebb.

But the appearance of the people on the streets is much as it used to be. They seem happy and carefree, and give no evidence of the worry that it would be natural to expect if they were laboring under a sense of impending doom.

At night the scene changes and the cities assume a gloomy look. It is due principally to the fact that street lighting has been cut down to save electricity and that cinemas and theatres are obliged to end their performances so early that most persons are in bed before midnight. There never was much night life in Rome or, indeed, in any Italian city, but now there is virtually none.

Cafes, cinemas and theaters, however, report that they are doing good business in the evening, because now that work ends in offices earlier than in the past the people find that time hangs heavily on their hands and crowd into places of amusement.

Diet Undergoes Changes

In family life the changes have been more profound. First, there is the matter of diet. A shortage of home-grown meat has obliged the government to order butcher shops to remain closed on Tuesday and Wednesday and this has obliged Italians to find substitutes for their main dish in the principal meals on two days of the week.

It is recommended that they consume larger quantities of fish and game, but these foods also are not plentiful and besides they are too dear for persons of meager means. Cheese and vegetables must therefore replace meat for many families. Several eminent doctors have declared that the health of the Italian people will benefit by the change, but even this has not succeeded in making it palatable to the majority.

A real revolution has been brought about in Italian life by the decision that all offices shall close at 4:30 o'clock in the afternoon and that work shall continue with a break of only thirty minutes through the hours formerly dedicated to the post-prandial siesta. Much of the grumbling against this system is due to the fact that the Italians have not yet realized that the change in their working hours should be accompanied by a corresponding change in their eating habits.

They still persist in having virtually no breakfast, with the result that they are hungry for lunch and cannot resist the temptation to eat a big plate of spaghetti or other heavy cereal food, usually washing it down with a glass or two of wine. Then they are surprised that it is an effort to get on with their work when they return to their offices.

Women Dislike Plan

Most women also have not much good to say for the closing of offices at 4:30. They do not like their menfolk to return home early and then go puttering around the house with nothing special to do and often getting in the way of women's domestic duties.

Some men have still another complaint to make namely, that they are now expected to work longer hours because their midday siesta has been suppressed but work continues just as late in the evening. These, however, are a small minority, for the authorities have taken severe measures to see that the new working hours are rigidly observed.

From a financial point of view persons who have not lost their jobs through the application of sanctions are no worse off than before. Prices have remained virtually unchanged, with the result that most household budgets have not suffered.

Some things are scarce, such as sugar, meat, soap and coal. On the other hand, the closing of many foreign markets to Italian exports has created surpluses of certain other goods, bringing about a fall in their prices that more than compensates for the increased cost of things that formerly were imported. Italy's choicest fruits and vegetables, for instance, which up to a few months ago were reserved for the foreign trade, are now perforce sold in Italy and may be bought very cheaply.

Heating Is a Problem

The shortage of coal has made it a real problem for many families to heat their homes. Fortunately for them, the Winter has been rainy but warm up to the present. Provision has moreover been made by the government to supply hotels with the coal they require so that tourists may not suffer from the cold.

Industrial workers as a whole have not felt the pinch of sanctions; indeed, they have benefited by them, for the heavy government orders of raw materials and the necessity of producing goods that formerly were supplied by foreign countries have kept almost all factories working to capacity.

Retail business, on the contrary, is very bad. So intense a campaign has been carried on against waste of all kinds that the people are not buying anything that is not absolutely necessary and retailers are feeling the consequences.

In agriculture conditions vary considerably. Farmers who raised high-class crops for the export trade are hard hit, for they can get rid of their products on the internal market only at very low prices. On the whole, however, farmers have not been doing badly and the price of agricultural land has been steadily increasing in the last few months.

The white collar class is the one that suffers most as a result of sanctions. With many businesses that existed by trading with foreign countries closing down, and with shops, hotels and offices reducing their staffs, many thousands of these workers have been and are being thrown out of work.

The distress is even more pronounced in small centers than in large ones, for the resources of the former are not so ample. Moreover, with the general tightening of belts that is going on all over Italy, relief is more difficult than it used to be because people do not give to charity so willingly or so liberally as before.

Special words are perhaps necessary for the tourist business which is the most severely damaged of all. The number of visitors coming to Italy is now reduced almost to nothing and all the huge organization that has been created through decades of effort to cater to them is running to waste. This is particularly noticeable in cities such as Florence, which is a main goal of sightseers and which used to have a large resident foreign colony. Now the hotels are empty and foreigners are selling their villas for whatever they can get. Many shops, restaurants and small business are closing and distress is becoming increasingly acute.

Morgan Never Neutral During War, He Admits

Mr. Morgan.

"Exactly, Germany!" said Senator Nye. "Unless you made arrangements with France, your correspondent was obviously expressing the fear that the American money market might not make connections with the allies, and Germany might get in."

Delayed Decision

Senator Nye said that on Aug. 9, 1914, Morgan & Co. communicated with its Paris correspondent delaying decision on the loan, and saying that exports involving gold were impossible.

The Morgan firm discussed matters with the State Department at the outset, Mr. Lamont and Mr. Morgan said, but they could not recall who made the approach.

"Our natural habit would have been to call up the State Department," Mr. Lamont said.

Mr. Morgan said he could not recall any personal call on President Wilson at this critical juncture, although he had seen him just before the war broke out.

Bryan Rejected Loan

The original test, on which the financial policy was laid down, was a proposed $10,000,000 loan to the French Government to be used for French purposes in the United States. Mr. Bryan, then Secretary of State, rejected the loan.

"One of the three reasons Mr. Bryan cited for rejecting the loan was that money is 'the worst of all contraband because it commands everything else,'" said Mr. Vandenberg.

"Do you agree with that?"

"No, I don't think I do, no," said Mr. Morgan.

"Wouldn't an enemy prefer to capture money above everything else?" asked Senator Clark.

"What would a shut-in enemy do with money?" retorted Mr. Morgan.

Morgan Corrects Quotation

A little later Mr. Lamont, smiling quoted the Bible as saying that "money is the root of all evil."

"Your quotation isn't correct," said Mr. Morgan, "the Bible says 'the love of money is the root of all evil.'"

Mr. Lamont and Morgan said they did not think money should be put on a contraband list. It had never been done so before, they added. The pending neutrality law would bar credits and loans to warring countries.

Frank A. Vanderlip then told the committee how the original State Department ban on loans to the allies was modified a few months after the outbreak of the war to allow the National City Bank to grant a $10,000,000 credit to France.

Arranged by Ambassador

The loan was arranged through Jules Jusserand, French Ambassador. Mr. Vanderlip, like Mr. Morgan, told the committee he had "not been neutral," but had sympathized with the allies from the beginning.

The committee read into the record a memorandum by Robert Lansing, then counsellor of the State Department, of a conversation with President Wilson in which he was authorized to disclose the changed financial policy.

This hitherto unpublished memorandum indicated that Mr. Lansing was ordered to announce the change to interested parties on his own responsibility. He communicated the fact to agents of the Morgan firm and the National City Bank.

Mrs. Catherine Akana, director of the American Board Mission Training School for Kindergarthers and principal of the Glory Kindergarten, gave an interesting address on child psychology at the regular weekly meeting of the Kobe Women's Club at the Tor Hotel Tuesday afternoon. Mrs. Paul Reed, chairman of the Home Problem Department, who had arranged the program, introduced the speaker, who is a specialist in Child Psychology. Mrs. Akana emphasized the value in child training of a knowledge of Child Psychology over the old-fashhioned hair brush method. She spoke of three ways in which the application of scientific imagination can be especially helpful; in habit forming, in developing the imagination, and in training the child to exercise his will in the right way.

Mrs. Akana said that in establishing character forming habits, it was essential to give concrete commands or directions rather than to deal with abstractions. "Be obedient" is a command that means little to a child, but "run", "jump", or "spring quickly" are commands within their comprehension.

Reich Scientists Uphold Freedom

Jewish members and collaborators, of whom Professor Haber was and Dr. Albert Einstein now is the most famous.

But the society prides itself on the fact that it never expelled anybody and that its losses were never due to any action of its own, but to forces beyond its control. As a matter of fact there are still many scientists of Jewish antecedents working with the society, for whom it is a haven of refuge after their expulsion from German universities.

Still Active in Society

Three of the best-known of these Jewish scientists are still active in the society. They are Professor Otto Meyerhoff, also a Nobel Prize winner, who is director of the Institute for Medical Physiology; Dr. Richard Goldschmidt, who is head of a department and whose work on animal heredity found rich acknowledgment in anniversary reviews, and Frau Professor Lise Meitner, specialist in physics and chemistry.

Furthermore, of the society's other three Nobel Prize winners of Jewish antecedents only Dr. Einstein is wholly lost to it: Jay Franck, who resigned as a German professor in April, 1933, in protest against the anti-Jewish campaign and is now in America, is still a corresponding member of the society; so is Professor Richard Willstatter.

In fact, while the society is pledged to service of the fatherland, the only active Nazi among its prominent members seems to be Professor Eugen Fischer, director of the Institute for Anthropology and a racial hygiene enthusiast.

All this helps to explain why the National Socialists regard the society with coolness, not to say suspicion, voiced for the occasion by the National Socialist press. The Black Corps, organ of the Picked Guard, and the Gestapo, which caters to the leveling urges of the "proletariat," mocks Professor Planck, the society and some of its members for their exclusiveness and social pretensions and, above all, for still courting the reflected splendor of the crown as revealed in their loyalty to the imperial name.

Attacks the Society

The Voelkischer Beobachter, which affects collectivist tendencies, acknowledges the work of individual institutes, but censures "costly mediocrity" and insists that the burden of scientific research work still rests on State institutions and universities.

Above all, however, it attacks the society for its political attitude, charging it was a playground for Catholics, Socialists and Jews and only slowly made friends with National Socialist principles.

"We must ask ourselves," the paper writes, "how far there is still room in the National Socialist State for the Kaiser Wilhelm Society in its present shape. National Socialist ideology calls for its own formation and the organization of German research work. We need no interference therein by capitalistic circles independent of the National Socialist State and leadership."

work out her own problems in time. There is no reason to believe that Italy can work them out for her.

"I have great faith in Africa. I feel that the people of the African continent will seek out their own destiny. Two hundred million people, armed with virility and intelligence, will not fail. They have been held back, it is true, but their educational facilities are increasing steadily. The Africans, basically, are no more savages than are the American Negroes in the South.

"I believe that the African states will be free some day. It may come about through gradual withdrawal of European power, or there may be a sudden overturn. Differences between sections of the continent would indicate the eventual formation of a federation of independent black states, rather than a single great Negro republic or empire."

Laughs at "Black Menace"

Mr. Robeson laughed at the suggestion that the rise of black nationalism might create a menace to white civilization.

"It's not a race problem at all," he said. "Any one can see that, if he'll really look. There isn't any sharp division, with one race uniting against another. Look at the war in Africa now. What is this Italian army fighting Ethiopia? Three-fourths of them are black fellows, fighting against other black fellows. And what goes on in Manchuria—yellow Japanese making war on yellow Chinese! The race question isn't of primary importance."

Mr. Robeson turned to the subject of Africa's native culture. He ventured a prediction that within five years the theater and literature of the western world would be taking as much interest in African affairs as it now takes in the culture of the American Negro.

"I've never been to Africa," he admitted, "though I hope to visit Uganda this winter. Most of the chaps I know in England are Africans, and I've learned a great deal about their problems. I even know a couple of African dialects."

Hauled back by questions to a discussion of his own work, Mr. Robeson said that the film he hoped to do next would present "an interesting tie-up between the Negro traditions in America and Africa." The scene opens in Africa at the time of the original Portuguese conquests; the hero is taken off to the United States, and eventually returns to his homeland. "It'll have lots of music," Mr. Robeson added.

"The most interesting thing I can see ahead for next season," he said, "is the musical play that Jerome may do, based on "Black Majesty," the story of Emperor Henri Chrisophe, who built his great citadel in Haiti and defeated Napoleon's troops. It sounds like great material, doesn't it?"

Chinese Diplomat's Wife Got Garner's 98c Watch

Oriental charm, Southern chivalry and a boast about American ingenuity brought Vice-President Garner back from his trip to China without his watch.

The timepiece changed ownership with Garner's full consent while the Vice-President was at a dinner in his honor at Shanghai, according to the New York Herald Tribune. Next to the bush-browed Uvaldean was the wife of a Chinese diplomat.

The Chinese woman expressed her admiration.

"Do you like that?" Garner said. "Well, you know, that watch is one thing we can make in America and sell cheap that you folks over here can't compete with. And they guarantee it to last a year, and replace it if anything goes wrong."

There was more admiration, whereupon chivalry and generosity got the best of Mr. Garner and he presented the watch to his dinner companion.

"Was it your best watch?" Garner was asked later.

"You bet your life it wasn't," he replied. "It set me back just 98 cents."

Nazi Edicts Kill Opposition Press

part of this drop was due to the compulsory elimination of free copies; but paid circulation, including street sales, which last year increased between the first and the second quarter, dropped in the same period this year from 16,274,592 to 15,850,206.

The Zeitungs Verlag remarks that in view of the policy of the National Socialist press, which has undertaken to remove what is decadent, in order to pave the way for the new, the above figures are both pleasant and hopeful, especially since the total number of printed copies exceeds slightly the total number of German households. In comparison, the total newspaper circulation of the United States is put at more than 55,000,000, including the weeklies, which are included in the German figures. But the Nazis privately admit that in view of the political uniformity of the German press there is scant hope of increasing circulation beyond one copy per household.

There is one additional factor which is contributing to the crisis of the German press. That is the widespread notion that advertising enterprise is contrary to the National Socialist principle, "the common good before self interest." Whole trade associations have taken the stand that if an individual business man steps out and starts a livelp advertising campaign, he is really acting selfishly against the common good, because he tries to take business away from others. Propagation of such ideas is now forbidden, but the notion persists and sporadic shortages of goods likewise have discouraged advertising. As a result, the German press is no longer in a position financially to exploit even the possibilities of enterprise left it by National Socialist coordination; and without new readers is difficult.

and big warships, the international control of the arms traffic, the prohibition of private manufacture of arms, and reduction of armies, navies and air forces to the lowest possible level.

On the question of economic reconstruction the council declares that "Britain can no longer tolerate the persistence of great areas of industrial depression and the suffering, impoverishment and demoralization of millions of its citizens through inability to find a job and earn a livelihood."

Its proposals include long-range measures to revive overseas trade and to reorganize industry and agriculture. At the same time, in order to meet more immediate needs it would promote useful works of public development on a large scale—to be paid for by a £240,000,000 loan—thereby stimulating revival of employment and reequipping the nation for advance to enduring prosperity.

be considered as a cure-all.

"True," he said, "once adopted, it will assist our social agencies in our local communities in preventing juvenile deliquency; our police officials in detecting and apprehending criminals: My recommendations will make it harder to escape prosecution. Suggested changes in the penal law and in the code of criminal procedure will substantially assist district attorneys and judges in making the conviction of the offender speedy, definite and certain. And that, after all, is the strongest deterrent to crime.

Finds Vigilance Needed

"Yet, to administer these improved laws and these new laws we must have police officials, sheriffs, district attorneys, magistrates, county judges, children's court judges, probation officers. In their hands must rest the ultimate advantage to be derived from these improvements in our law enforcement set-up. Unless these officers are vigilant; unless they are vigorous; unless they are honest and independent, much of the gain which may be won through the adoption of my recommended program will have been dissipated. . . .

"Those law enforcement officers are largely elected by the people of local communities—our counties, cities, towns and villages. In the last analysis, therefore, it is for the people through local elections to place in office public officials who will not be swayed by political influence and who possess both integrity and ability. My friends, let us be courageous. All over the state we must destroy any partnership between organized crime and politics. We must preserve the vitality and honesty of our democratic government. That can only be done if we enlist and keep permenently enlisted intelligent and militant public opinion which can make its influence felt in the counties, cities, villages and towns of our state."

More than 100 members of the Albany Society came from New York City to attend the dinner.

Platform Drafted By Father Divine

5,000 Of His Followers Adopt Program Of World Reform But Deny New Party

With disclaimers frequently voiced by those who spoke for him of any intention of organizing a new political party, the first political platform of the Internaional Righeous Government Convention of Father Divine's Peace Mission was read recently to 5,000 Negroes and whites who jammed St. Nicholas Palace, 69 West Sixty-sixth Street, New York City.

Father Divine occupied an inconspicuous position on the packed platform of the hall, while John Lamb, white, designated as one of his secretaries, red the lengthy political document, says the New York Times. Divided into numerous sections such as "Politics," "Economics" and "Education," the document, which required one hour and a half to read, calls for a multitude of reforms, for the repeal of many laws and the enactment of many more new ones.

Racial Equality Demanded

It asks for the confiscation of all arms; it calls upon all true followers of Father Divine to refuse to engage in armed combat for any cause whatever; it is for the Constitution 100 per cent and for the repeal of all laws that go contrary to that document; it urges universal racial equality; it seeks the licensing only of employment agencies which collect alone from the employer; it asked the outlawing of all kinds of compulsory insurance and the repeal of all laws legalizing liability insurance; it asks for new laws making the medical profession guarantee cures and to be liable for all deaths in cases under their care. It calls for the abolition of the greeting, "Hello!," and the substitution therefor of the word, "Peace," with an enabling act compelling the telephone company to take cognizance of this movement.

To achieve the objectives set forth in the platform, Mr. Lamb said, "We will use all of the political guns at our command."

Arthur Madison, Negro, who served as "alternate chairman" of the three-day convention, which ended with yesterday's meeting, also explained the planned modus operandi in turning Father Divine's claimed 20,000,000 religious followers into a force for righteous government, saying, "We are trying to break down all political party barriers. We are not setting up a new political party. We are remaining in the existing parties. If President Roosevelt acts with righteousness, justice and truth, he will have the support of all the followers of Father Divine."

A Few of the Planks

Some of the planks of the platform, as read by Mr. Lamb, follow:

"Abolition of all tariff schedules.

"Legislation limiting profit on manufactured articles.

"Government operation of the financial institutions of the country.

"Destruction of all counterfeit money, at the expense of whoever first finds out it is counterfeit. There must be no attempt to pass it on.

"True followers of Father Divine must immediately and henceforth stop buying on the installment plan.

"Enactment of laws against all newspapers and publications which employ words designating the difference in creeds, races and conditions of peoples.

"Enactment of a law prohibiting vaccination and prohibiting all kinds of compulsory medical examinations.

Want Stolen Goods Returned

"Immediate return of all stolen goods, either by individuals or by nations.

"Immediate enactment of a law fixing the maximum fee which can be charged by a labor union for membership; and a law prohibiting labor unions from calling strikes unless they pay, during the strike, to all of their members, the full wage for which they are striking.

"The abolition of capital punishment.

"All candidates, including the President, must be nominated directly by the people.

"Immediate abandonment of the patronage system.

"The enactment of laws requiring the government to take over all plants, factories and tools whose owners refuse to use or to operate them at their full capacity."

At the conclusion of the reading of the platform Mr. Lamb showed the audience Father Divine's signature at the bottom of the document and the thousands attending stood up and sang, to the tune of "Marching Through Georgia," "He's God! He's God! He's God!"

Political observers from the Republican, Democratic, Communist and Socialist parties attended the meeting.

U.S. Was Not Forced In War, Avers Morgan

the flotation of British loans in the United States, contrary to the earlier Bryan policy of the Wilson Administration.

Morgans Deny Influence

The Morgan partners hotly deny any such pressure, and declare they kept themselves free from political concerns while serving as the purchasing agents of Great Britain and France, during which time they bought $3,000,000,000 worth of goods, at a commission to themselves of $30,000,000.

The story as presented was of a declining exchange rate of sterling in 1915, as Great Britain incurred millions of dollars of debt in the United States with its war purchases. Incidentally, such purchases would be barred in future, under the terms of the current neutrality resolution.

Drop Sterling Support

The Morgans precipitated the decline by withdrawing their support of the sterling market, resulting in a sharp drop in exchange. In two weeks, sterling dropped from $4.71 to $4.56. H. P. Davidson, Morgan partner, then consulted with Mr McAdoo, and urged action.

The exchange rate reached a point such as to endanger American debts, and Mr. McAdoo and Robert Lansing, counselor of the State Department felt the whole United States foreign trade structure was in grave danger. It was at his point that Mr. McAdoo wrote a blunt letter to the President, received Aug. 21, urging that America should do everything it could "to assist our customers to buy."

Calls Two Pro-German

The McAdoo letter seems destined for a niche in history. He charged two members of the Federal Reserve Board, Paul M. Warburg, and Adolph C. Miller with being "pro-German."

A new loan policy followed, announced in a note signed "W. W." and addressed to the Secretary of State. The first big Anglo-French $500,000,000 loan was offered to the public by Morgan Oct. 14.

At one point, laughter echoed in the committee room when a Morgan cable of June 26, 1915 was read into the record, criticizing "idiocy" of newspapermen in suggesting that Allied powers could not meet their obligations. The message read in part:

Morgan Apologizes

"Whether caused by German propaganda or simply by usual idiocy of newspapermen, has been considerable discussion in last few weeks in newspapers of how impossible it is for belligerent countries in Europe to pay for the amounts they are taking from United States.

Mr. Morgan laughed as the message was read, and remarked:

"I did not know the newspapermen then so well as I know them now," he said, turning to the press tables, "and I apologize for what I said in that cable."

Both Mr. Morgan and Thomas W. Lamont, heatedly denied they had brought "leverage" on the State Deparment. Their attiude was expressed in Mr. Lamon's statement:

Hoped to Shorten War

"We understand purchasing for the Allies was to shorten the war materially. The British were unprepared and Germany was the aggressor nation and was prepared. We believe our activities in purchasing did shorten the war.

"We felt it would not be right to bring pressure on Great Britain by withdrawing supplies. We were not for Germany. We were for the Allies."

In addition to the McAdoo letter of Aug. 21, the committee read a whole series of other documents into the record, all for the first time published, showing the pressure of bankers and others to have the Bryan ban on loans removed.

President Is Won Over

Bryan had imposed this ban as Secretary of State, but had been succeeded by Robert Lansing, who favored such loans, as did Mr. McAdoo.

President Wilson agreed ultimately and, on Aug. 25, conveyed the opinion that the Government's policy should be changed, but that it should no be "put in writing." He added:

"My opinion in this matter, compendiously stated, is that we should say that parties would take no action either for or against such a transaction, but that this should be orally conveyed, so far as we are concerned and not put in writing."

In his letter to the President, dated Aug. 21, 1915, before the United States had entered the war, and when it was maintaining a neutrality policy, Mr. McAdoo disclosed the barriers that were preventing the Allies from obtaining needed credits.

In one direction the neutrality policy as stated by Secretary of State William J. Bryan discouraged war loans.

"It is imperative," Mr. McAdoo wrote, "for England to establish a large credit in this country. She will need at least $500,000,000. She can't get this in any way, at the moment, that seems feasible, except by sale of short-time government notes.

Hits Bryan Snag

"Here she encounters the obstacles presented by Mr. Bryan's letter of Jan. 20, 1915, to Senator Stone, in which it is stated that 'war loans in this country were disapproved because inconsistent with the spirit of neutrality,' etc., and 'this Government has not been advised that any general loans have been made by foreign governments in this country since the President expressed his wish that loans of this character should not be made.'"

Diaries of Court Ladies of Old Japan

Printed on Japanese Paper; Classical Binding.

Translated By
ANNIE SHEPLEY OMORI AND KOCHI DOI

This book contains three diaries of Court Ladies who lived 900 years ago in the Heian Period. One of the Diaries is by Murasaki Shikibu, author of the recently translated novel, Genji Monogatari, who delineates in her inimitable manner the birth of the Crown Prince with vivacious descriptions of people and incidents.

The SARASHINA DIARY begins when, as a child, the author took the journey from a spot north of Tokyo to Kyoto, when her father, a province governor, was returning to the court of Kyoto. This journey required two months of continuous travel and is described in great detail.

The third in the book is by another famous lady, Izumi Shikibu, a poetess who has noted in her diary the incidents of the "affair" with a great prince, who sought her and brought her to his palace.

The translations have been made by Prof. Kochi Doi of the Imperial University of Sendai and Annie Shepley Omori, of New England origin and Japanese affiliations.

Boycott Urged To Force 'Jafsie' Off Jersey Stage

Lindbergh case and at the trial of Bruno Richard Hauptmann.

David T. Wilentz, Attorney General of New Jersey, who prosecuted Hauptmann, has asked Dr. Condon to forgo any personal appearances in Perth Amboy, N. J., it was learned last night. Perth Amboy is Mr. Wilentz's home town. The American Federation of Actors, American Federation of Labor union covering bona fide vaudevile performers, protested Dr. Condon's theater appearances on the ground it represented "use of the stage as a dumping ground for those who come into the spotlight through tragedy."

Leo Justin, general manager of the Walter Reade theater chain, which controls the Plainfield Strand, said that he could see no reason for abandoning the Condon tour which started several months ago in Boston and has already taken the erstwhile Jafsie to Asbury Park, Long Branch and Red Bank in New Jersey. He said that there had been no protest in the past and that he thought it was up to the public whether it wanted to see Dr. Condon. He added that the Reade chain engaged Dr. Condon about a week ago, through the latter's agent, Lester Lockwood, of City Island.

Informed of the clergymen's statement, Dr. Condon said that he was conducting a "crusade against crime" in his three shows a day and that his only payment was what a theater chose to give him. He said that the church should aid in his "crusade against crime," particularly because Colonel Charles A. Lindbergh had left the United States to find a safe haven in England. "If the ministers of New Jersey find time to keep an individual American from making a crusade against crime, I would like to get the opportunity to visit their parishes to find how they run their parishes," he added.

Farm Income Gain Cited By Wallace

In judging, from the consumers' standpoint, the advance that has taken place in farm commodity prices since 1933, we should bear in mind the low point to which they had then sunk.

Farm Output Held Not Lagging

In March, 1933, farm commodity prives averaged only 55 per cent of the pre-war level. Action is going forward to correct the farm commodity shortages which the drought caused, and the farm adjustment program as a whole contemplates ample production for domestic consumption.

Agriculture is not the laggard in production. In August, 1935, factory employment in this country was nearly one-fourth lower than it was in 1928, and about one-fourth of the urban population that should have been employed was not.

But most of the factory unemployment was in the factories processing industrial, not farm products. Factories processing farm products employed in 1934 about 82 per cent as many wage-earners as they did in 1929, whereas the factories processing non-agricultural raw materials employed 30 per cent less labor than in 1929.

Most of our agricultural, industrial, and fiscal difficulties would be solved if the manufacturing branches of industry were operating as freely as the agricultural.

From the standpoint of domestic requirements, agriculture, in contrast with industry, has maintained its output. Fortunately during 1935 the output of industry had a very hopeful upward slant and in this evidence of restored, balanced production both farm and city people can take renewed courage.

Alberta's Social Credit Govt. Adopts New Policy

the aim of Social Credit—the payment of a "cultural heritage dividend." Appeals for cooperation are heard daily. The Premier, in addressing a convention of teachers recently, asked for their "cooperation in reporting persons able to pay taxes but refusing." Similar suggestions have been heard from others. Indeed, one of the disquieting features of the new Government is an evident tendency to encourage a "tell-on-your-neighbor" attitude of mind. During a preliminary burst of activity questionnaires relating to income, positions, assets, and so on were sent out to all the Social Credit "study groups" in rural districts. Members of these groups, which had served as the "cells" around which Social Credit built up its political organization, were expected to "list all those entitled to the dividend." Little, however, has been heard of these questionnaires lately.

The Government has also shown an inclination to make use of members of the party organization for purposes which, under a strict definition, would be classified as Government business. Whether this tendency to build a civilian adjunt to the civil service will grow, remains to be seen. Probably the Government will discover that too many citizens resent "prying" into their affairs by neighbors to allow the practice to continue very long.

Tomb of Will Adams and His Wife.

Dr. Scherer's presentation of "Miura Anjin" as a Japanese samurai is thrilling, and his portraiture of that bygone time has the ring of truth. His romance is real history, and I find it far superior to any historical novel of recent years. For he knows the Old Japan at first hand, and has absorbed its atmosphere. He is as much at home on the straw-mats of Nihon as in the Mermaid Tavern: and he transports his reader with him.'—Dr. Thomas Baty in The Japan Times.

U.S. Finds Rise In Drink Deaths In 4 Dry States

Wet New York Cut Rate In '34, Repeal's 1st Year, To Shame Arid Neighbors

A special study by the United States Census Bureau disclosed that four of the states that were dry during 1934, the first full year of repeal, were among the ten which had the biggest gains in alcoholism deaths that year. And, on the other side, New York had the biggest decrease in the number of persons who drank themselves to death in 1934.

The ten states that suffered the largest gains were California, Georgia, Massachusetts, Missouri, North Carolina, Ohio, Oklahoma, Pennsylvania, Texas and Virginia, according to the New York Times.

Numerical increase, Massachusetts, Pennsylvania and Ohio led, the first two each having fifty-five deaths more than they had in 1933, and Ohio having a gain of fifty-four.

Four Dry States Suffer

Georgia, North Carolina, Oklahoma and Texas were still dry in 1934. Of the four, Texas so far is the only one that has legalized the sale of hard liquor.

New York, Kentucky and Wisconsin were the three states that had the biggest decrease in deaths from alcoholism. New York had sixty-one fewer than in 1933; Kentucky twenty-three fewer and Wisconsin eighteen fewer.

Twelve other states and the District of Columbia also had slightly improved records. The twelve were Idaho, Iowa, Minnesota, Montana, New Hampshire, North Dakota, Oregon, Rhode Island, South Carolina, South Dakota, Tennessee and Utah.

Maryland and Mississippi had the same number of deaths in 1934 as in 1933. All others showed gains. The national record was an increase of 358, the total being 3,655.

Figures on which to base a calculation of the alcoholism death rate for 1934 were not available, but the Census Bureau found that in 1933 the deaths ascribed to alcoholism were 2.6 to 100,000 population. That was the year that ended prohibition and brought beer back. The rate rose .1 to 100,000 over 1932, or one more such death to each million inhabitants.

That was the first increase the alcoholism death rate had shown since 1927 and 1928, when it reached its prohibition peak, for those two years at four death to 100,000. During the depression years that followed it had declined to a low of 2.5 in 1932.

High for 24 Years Is 5.9

The high for the entire twenty-four years covered by the Census Bureau study was 5.9 to 100,000 in the pre-prohibition year of 1913. Then the figures sagged, but rose again to 5.8 in 1916. They began to shrink under the gradually increasing grip of prohibition in 1918 and 1919 and reached their nadir in 1920, the first full year of prohibition. That year there was only one death to 100,000.

There were almost twice as many alcoholism deaths in the second year of prohibition, however, and the rate rose to 1.8. As the bootlegger came into affluence, the rate mounted with each succeeding year of prohibition until it reached the highs of 1927 and 1928.

In the ultra-arid years of 1919, 1920 and 1921, when private stocks of pre-prohibition liquors supplied most of the fluid for drinking, the death rate was 1.6, 1.0 and 1.8, respectively, the only three years covered by the study in which it was below two deaths to 100,000.

In the war year of 1918 that ushered in the prohibition era, California, Connecticut, Massachusetts, Montana, Ohio and Rhode Island were the only states to have a rate of four or more to 100,000. In the climb that began again in 1922 Colorado, Delaware, Massachusetts, Montana, New Hampshire, Rhode Island and Wyoming were the first states to reach that rate. Colorado dropped below this figure the following year, but Maryland, New York and Pennsylvania climbed above it, to stay there, save for few variations, until repeal.

Lincoln-Zephyr V-12 Advanced In Design

is an ash tray which may be removed for the installation of a radio control. The parking brake is at the left of the driver beneath the cowl.

The engine, built in the Lincoln plant, is a V-12 of new design. The cylinder block, including cylinder banks, exhaust passages, crankcase and flywheel housing, is cast in one unit, permitting greater rigidity and a cleaner design. The cylinder banks are set at 75 degrees angle.

Cylinder dimensions are 2-¾ inches bore by 3-¾ inches stroke.

Piston displacement is 267cubic inches, compression ratio, 6.7-to-1. S.A.E. rating is 36.3 horsepower, actual brake horsepower developed being listed at 110 at 3900 r.p.m. Pistons, of cast alloy steel, are a new development of Ford metallurgy.

The engine crankshaft also is of Ford-developed cast steel alloy, with nine integrally cast full-weight counterbalances. It has four main bearings of the removable insert type. Connecting rods are mounted inpairs side by side on sleeve-type bearing inserts of steel surfaced with a special anti-friction material. Chrome steel valves, of Ford type with mushroom ends, are precision set at the factory and are non-adjustable. They are actuated by a cast alloy iron camshaft through Ford-type light-weight pushrods. Exhaust valve seat inserts are employed.

Carburetor

Carburetor is of the dual downdraft type, with duplex intake manifold cast integral with the alumium valve-chamber cover. Cylinder heads are of cast aluminum. An intake air silencer is mounted above the carburetor air intake. Fuel is supplied from a 15-gallon (Imperial) gasoline tank at the rear by a fuel pump actuated from the camshaft.

Centrifugal pumps located at the lower engine front, one in each of the engine water intake lines, circulate the water in the engine cooling system. Capacity of the system is four gallons.

The 17-plate battery is fed by a generator mounted above the front of engine, which is actuated by belt driven from a crankshaft pulley. The belt also drives the two circulating water pumps. The fan is mounted directly on the crankshaft. A weatherproof Ford-type distributor is mounted ahead of the engine. It is driven directly by the camshaft.

Transmission has quiet helical gears in all speeds, with a synchronizing device for silent shifting up or down between second and high speeds. The transmission countershaft is mounted on roller bearings, providing anti-friction bearing mounting in all forward speeds.

The clutch is of single dry-plate type, requiring unusually light pedal effort for operation at shifting speed. Centrifugal force exerted by weights on the throw-out arms serves to insure against slippage at driving speeds.

The drive is through full torque tube, radius rods, and a three-quarter floating rear axle with straddle mounted pinion. Standard rear axle ratio is 4.33-to-1.

Wheels are of one-piece welded steel construction, with 7.00 x 16 inch tires carrying 28 pounds pressure. Worm and roller type sector cross-steering is employed, with a steering gear ratio of 18-to-1.

The brakes are mechanical, of the two-shoe energizing type and cable-controlled, providing deceleration capacity in keeping with the car's high performance. Drums are of cast alloy iron, with cooling ribs. Double-acting hydraulic shock absorbers are employed to cushion road shocks.

$200,000 Bid Wins Conclave; Begins June 23

Chicago Is $50,000 Under Winner; S. F. Offers $150,000

The Democratic national convention, which is to renominate President Roosevelt, will be held at Philadelphia June 23, two weeks after the Republican convention at Cleveland, reports a Washington corespondent of the Chicago Daily Tribune.

The Democratic national committee meeting here today auctioned off the convention to the highest bidder. Chicago and San Francisco each offered $150,000. Philadelphia raised the bid to $200,000 and won.

It is doubtful that Chicago could have won even with an equivalent bid, for the Democratic leaders, including the President himself, were known to be partial to Philadelphia.

May Kill Two-Thirds Rule

The committee authorized its chairman to call the convention for the usual purposes and also for consideration of the proposal to change the rules to provide for nominations by a majority instead of a two-third vote. The Chicago convention in 1932 recommended that the 1936 convention consider this revocation of the two-thirds rule which Andrew Jackson caused the party to adopt to insure the nomination of Martin Van Buren for Vice President in 1832.

Under the terms of the resolution authorizing the call the convention will consist of 1,082 delegates—two for each senator and representative and the remainder for the territories and possessions. The convention imposes rigid economy in the convention arrangements.

Predicts Bitter Campaign

Before the committee got down to the business it listened to a speech by Chairman Farley, in which he predicted "our opponents will make this the bitterest and certainly the dirtiest political struggle that any of us here can remember."

Farley's address to the committee was at once a warning that every Democrat must be up on his toes and a defense of the Roosevelt administration.

He predicted the campaign waged by the opponents of the New Deal would be a "campaign of defamation" and that the "assault on the Roosevelt administration would be financed by the largest slush fund on record, contributed for the most part by those who have neither public conscience nor private scruple."

Insists Pledges Kept

The President, Farley insisted, had kept his pledges to the people—that none should starve, that there should be sound currency and government credit, that prohibition should be repealed—and had put the country successfully on the road to recovery.

National Committeeman Frank Hague of New Jersey offered a resolution reaffirming the loyalty of the members of the committee to President Roosevelt and indorsing the efforts "of our great leader."

The resolution was slated to go through unanimously.

Gov. Eugene Talmadge of Georgia, bitter foe of the Roosevelt administration, a member of the national committee, loudly shouted "no" when the resolution was put to a vote.

That the selection of the convention city would be an auction developed at the beginning.

On Three Bidders

Chairman Farley announced that there were only three bidders for the convention—California, Illinois and Pennsylvania—and proceeded to introduce the representatives of those states in alphabetical order.

Senator William G. McAdoo of California depicted the glories of the west coast climate and wound up with a bid of $150,000 and a rent free convention hall on behalf of San Francisco.

"Senator McAdoo opened the pot and we'll stay," said Pat Nash, Illinois national committeeman, in rising to present the speakers for Chicago.

"We are not here to play poker," said Robert F. Carr, co-chairman of the Chicago citizens' committee, "but are here to offer you a certified check for $150,000."

George W. Young explained the convention accommodations in Chicago and then Albert Lasker, co-chairman of the citizens' committee, came forward with Chicago's check and waved it aloft for all to see.

"This is real money," said Mr. Lasker. "It is a check certified by the bank of which your treasurer is chairman, and it ought to be good. It is not subject to income tax or other ravages, if you know what I mean."

Senator James Hamilton Lewis of Illinois formally extended the city's invitation on behalf of Mayor Kelly, who was unable to be present.

"If the party holds its convention in Chicago," said the senator, "it will benefit incalculably from the publicity of the convention deliberations which the Chicago newspapers will disseminate throughout the region which it is of the greatest importance the party should carry in the election."

Easy For Him

At the circus the strong man dipped a sponge into a pail of water and squeezed it until every drop of water was out of it. He invited anyone to enter the ring and try to squeeze another drop out of the sponge.

Several men tried, without any result. At last a small man entered. To the astonishment of all, he squeezed out drop after drop!

A member of the audience recognized the man and shouted: "That's not a fair test! He's a bill collector!"

Nanking Reviving Cult Of Confucius

of him, as many might expect in a Chinese temple.

Beautiful Setting

One enters the temple by a three-gate arrangement, finding a crescent pond inside with two stone lions crouched on either side of the water. Over the pond are three small bridges. Beyond is a portico in which are shown a large drum and bell. From here extends a wide avenue shaded with aged trees to an elevated tier. At the center, not used by the general public which proceeds up by side steps, is a stone slab carved in relief with a coiled dragon design to be trodden only by the Emperor himself. This leads to the main hall. Behind is a minor hall, honoring the disciples. Other details of the compound include a pavilion, a zigzag bridge over a lotus pond, a bell tower and a library.

Ancient trees are always a feature of Confucian establishments—firs and pines predominating. They seem to symbolize to the Chinese mind something of the stanchness, beauty and vitality which they read into Confucian principles for the conduct of their daily life.

Once Railroad Site

Temples of other sorts, mostly Buddhistic, play a great part in the social as well as religious side of Chinese existence and some of these have curious histories. The ground occupied by the Temple of the Queen of Heaven in Shanghai, for example, was formerly the site of the railway station and yards built as part of the construction of China's first railway which connected Shanghai with Woosung, a fishing village about 15 miles distant at the point where the Whangpoo River—running past Shanghai—joins with the mighty Yangtze.

So much opposition was aroused among the Chinese masses by this new departure, the "fire-horse," that the then Imperial Chinese Government at last bought the line, tore up the tracks, and shipped the iron rails to the island of Formosa where they lay out in the open until its tropical climate had caused them to disappear in rust.

There was a general opinion among the Chinese that malign influences had been set working by this business of the railway, so in order to correct the "feng-shui"—the wind and water influences of the locality—the Government caused the railway station to be razed and the temple built.

Typical of the practical Chinese capability for blending all elements of life without conflict is the fact that part of the temple ground is occupied by the Chinese Chamber of Commercee.

Stratosphere Kite?

It is characteristic of the trade guilds to worship special gods or saints and one of the most interesting is Lu Pan, a contemporary of Confucius, who is noted for his achievement in constructing a most remarkable wooden kite which modern meteorologists would have found useful in the extreme. It is reputed to have risen to such great heights, due to the excellence of its design and construction, that three days were required to pull it back to the ground.

Shanghai has but one pagoda and that on the outskirts at Lunghwa. Pagodas are supposed to correct anything wrong with the "feng-shui" and it is interesting in this wind-water connection to note that whereas the pagoda was always near the water of the Whangpoo, it is now next to a modern airport where man's ships of the air now sail in, under direction of two commercial air lines, from all part of China. No one seems to have untangled what influence, if any, the pagoda has on the planes or vice versa but at least the pagoda is a picturesque adjuct to aerial photography.

Roosevelt Insists On New Farm Bill

He Makes Statement After Hearing Of Norris View That Any Control Is Illegal

Despite an opinion expressed in Washington D.C., on Jan 14 by Senator Norris that no law regulating agricultural production could be worked out within the limits of the United States Supreme Court decision outlawing the AAA, President Roosevelt expressed a hope at his press conference that Senator Norris had been overly pessimistic and said that a bill embodying a substitute program would be introduced in Congress.

However, the plans for early passage of a bill were threatened by conflicting views of farm leaders who testified that same day before the Senate Committee on Agriculture, according to the New York Times. Proposals ranging through dollar devaluation, guaranteed cost of production for farmers and the original domestic-allotment plan with unlimited production were among those heard before the committee this morning and afternoon.

Challenge To Congress

The keynote of the hearing came when, in the midst of applause, M. W. Thatcher, representative of the Farmers National Grain Corporation, agreed with Senator Norris that Congress could not be blamed for the invalidation of the AAA, but that it would be blamed "if you stand for it."

Senator Norris's opinion fell like a bombshell in the midst of testimoney by Earl Smith, president of the Illinois Agricultural Society and chairman of the farm leaders' conference, which last week drafted a seven-point program for replacing the AAA.

Mr. Smith had just completed the presentation of the conference plan for attaining production control indirectly through subsidized soil conservation when Senator Norris asked:

"After all, doesn't that mean that you would have agricultural production under regulation?"

Mr. Smith replied in the affirmative.

Senator Norris then interpreted the court's decision as meaning that since "the framers of the Constitution 140 years ago did not say anything about regulating agricultural production, it is not permissible in this day and therefore unconstitutional."

"I don't believe it possible to pass any law that in any way regulates agricultural production that would be constitutional," he continued. "I hate to say it, because I think the decision was absolutely wrong, but the court says in so many words 'Regulation of agricultural production is unconstitutional,' and you don't have to be a lawyer to see that point.

Thinks AAA Constitutional

"I thought the act was constitutional and I think so yet"

Measures to prevent lower courts from passing on constitutional questions and to require unanimous decision of the Supreme Court for the overthrow of acts of Congress were advanced by Senator Norris as the only remaining solution in the crisis in which the Federal Government was left by the voiding of the AAA.

Senator Smith, committee chairman, who has openly opposed Federal regulation of farming since the AAA decision, appeared irritated over the length and aeagerness of witnesses to discuss the Supreme Court and the Constitution.

"Later," he said, "we will go into executive session and cuss and discuss the Supreme Court at our pleasure."

Mr. Thatcher drew applause by contrasting the court's action on the AAA and the position it adopted many years ago against a North Dakota law requiring wheat prices based on grading and standards of the grain. Then the court ruled that such activity was beyond the province of the State and was a Federal matter, he said, whereas now it holds any regulations of agriculture to be purely a local function.

House Plan Outlined

In a statement interpreted as foreshadowing the general lines of a bill to be reported soon by his committee, Chairman Johnes of the House agricultural group said that he favored a "domestic allotment plan linked with a soil rebuilding and conservation program including the seeking of new markets, domestic and foreign."

"This plan would entitle the producer to a premium on that part of the commodity which is domestically consumed and the remaining part of the production would have access to the market of the world," he declared.

"Although proper adjustment is desirable, wo should produce all the market will absorb, both at home and abroad".

Representative Sauthoff of Wisconsin introduced a resolution today calling on the President to estoblish import quotas of 50 per cent of the average annual production f Edam, Cheddar, Goudda and Gruyere cheese from Canada, Switzerland The Netherlands.

The preamble to the resolution asserted that the President had assured the country that no reductions would be made in taariffs on agricultural commodities and that this promise had been broken in the Canadian and other reciprocal trade treaties.

Divergent Proposals

The first open indication that some oganized farm groups might press for farm-relief provisions not favored by the administration came from witnesses before the Senate Agriculture Committee on Jan. 14.

L. J. Taber, master of the National Grange, said that suggestions for legislation would be given to the committee by the Grange within a few days. Fred J. Brenckman, the Grange legislative representative, supported export debentures, which he termed "morally sound." He also urged that reciprocal trade agreements be subject to Senate ratification.

Sam Everson, president of the National Farmers Union, asked enactment of the Frazier-Lemke Bill to refinance farm mortgages at a low rate of interest.

O. L. Brownlee of the League for Economic Equality and the Progressive Farmers Union, Sioux City, Iowa, said that "Agriculture cannot run the risk of another setback at the hands of the judiciary."

Mackay Wireless Makes War on RCA

Company Reveals Plans For World-Wide Rivalry In Radio Communications

The rivalry of two American companies in the field of international radio-telegraphic communications came before the Federal Communications Commission on Jan. 14.

A petition of the Mackay Radio and Telegraph Company, Inc., to add Oslo to its service as a point of radio communication has developed into a test case on whether duplicate services on a large scale will be permitted, according to the New York Times. RCA Communications, Inc., is the other company involved.

The FCC unexpectedly disclosed through Commissioner Irvin Stewart, conducting current hearings, that it regarded this as a policy case for the commission.

Ellery W. Stone, operating vice president of the Mackay company, told the commission that his organization would like to establish far-flung radio- telegraph services which allegedly would conflict in many cases with those of RCA.

He testified concerning what he termed "the monopolistic position" of the Radio Corporation of America. His testimony was challenged as "pure demagogy" by Frank W. Wozencroft, RCA counsel, who asserted that his company had received no intimation that the hearing would deal with a situation covering the globe.

Thus the FCC will give a decision on perhaps the most important case yet before it at a time when it is under self-investigation by a committee of five of its members and when it is threatened by a Congressional investigation on its manner of operation. Chairman Connery of the House Labor Committee announced today that he would introduce his resolution calling for an investigation tomorrow.

"The witness is pointing out the whole competitive situation in the radio telegraph field," Howard L. Kern, Mackay counsel, asserted in reply to objection by the RCA counsel. "If we are going to have an orderly presentation of the case, we must bring in the whole competitive picture."

Later Mr. Stewart declared:

The chair agrees that this hearing may have something to do with the establishment of a policy by this commission. The commission has no desire to try to establish a policy without considerin ghistory."

The Mackay counsel cited a letter from the secretary of the FCC dated Jan. 3 which asked the company to be prepared to testify upon "all activities in developing radio telegraph circuits not only for Norway but for any other country or countries."

The testimony covered a wide range of activities and negotiations, with the relevancy of many statements being contested by RCA counsel. Points discussed included the part that the Federal Telegraph Company, absorbed by Mackay, played in developing the vacuum tube oscillator, now a standard part of radio equipment, negotiations in China, Czechoslovakia and many parts of the world, and a Federal court decision affecting RCA's foreign contracts.

In reply to persistent questions Mr. Stone said, "We have a desire to furnish radio-telegraph service wherever the need for it appears evident."

He asserted that a service between South America and Europe appeared desirable, especially to Germany, and possibly England and France, and added that "there is a distinct need" for direct radio communication between Argentina and Japan.

He testified that the Mackay Company and its subsidiaries now have "transoceanic point-to-point service" with Buenos Aires, Rio de Janeiro Bogota, Santiago, Chile; Lima Peru; Camaguey, uba; Budapest Copenhagen and Vatican City. Most of these stations, he said, have been established since acqhisition of Mackay by the International Telephone and Telegraph Company in 1928. He added:

"The only serious obstacle to development by the Mackay system has been the one agency—the Radio Corporation of America—which, at every turn, has taken steps to preserve its monopolistic position."

The witness cited that he said were exclusive RCA contracts with Grea Brian, France, Sweden, Poland and "wih many other countries," including Norway.

He declared that an arbitrator at The Hague had upheld the RCA's "exclusive" rights in a contract with the Czechoslovak Government when Mackay entered into a traffic agreement with that government for a circuit of its own, but that The Hague arbitrator later ruled in favor of Mackay with regard to a similar Chinese contract.

The Mackay company suggested that a consent decree by the Federal District Court in Wilmington July 2, 1935, which disposed of the communication agreements of the Radio Corporation of America and RCA Communications, Inc., with foreign countries, including China, Poland and Czechoslovakia indicated the position of the United States Government in this controversy.

Mr. Wozencraft immediately declared:

"The Department of Justice did not object in its various petitions to a single circuit or the existence of only one circuit between the United States and any foreign country."

Goebbels Demands Colonies For Reich

many has been forced to make, reducing her food imports from 2,500,000,000 marks worth annually to 1,000,000,000 since 1933. The foreign exchange thus saved, the Propaganda Minister explained, had been employed largely to obtain material with which to equip the new military establishment.

Dr. Goebbels took special issue with those Americans who criticize the Nazi Jewish policy, declaring:

"There are Americans and American newspapers that are continually deploring the fate of the poor Jews in Germany, but the Americans' national hero has left their land to escape child-murderers. Germany has not yet sunk so deep. Here we act according to the law. No famous man has had to flee from Germany to save the life of his child."

Disputes Roosevelt Statement

Dr. Goebbels also undertook to refute President Roosevelt's recent statements regarding autocracies as a source of war.

"It was not an autocracy but a democracy that went to war in 1917. It is easier for a democracy to enter a war than for the National Socialist Government, for democratic governments disappear, but we are responsible to the nation. We must explain our conduct later.

"We have only to consider the revelations made by the newly created investigation commission (the Senate Munitions Investigation Committee) to discover that even the banks had a word to say somewhere in the dark. For us that is all not so simple. We have an ennobled form of democracy and can depend on the people."

The movie star vamps the good looking but slow young man who is engaged to the movie-struck girl of the family, and offers to take him with her to Hollywood. The plot develops rapidly around the unexpected visitor.

Mrs. Gregor Merrill is taking the leading role as the movie actress while her husband plays opposite her. Others in the cast are Mrs. D. D. MacGregor, Mrs. J. H. Chapman, Miss Duvall, Miss Bartlett, Mr. Harry Cary, Mrs. A. C. Buffman, Mr. George Hayes, and Mr. Burton Crane. velt."

Roland Hayes, the Negro tenor, sang "The Battle Hymn of the Republic" so magnificently that he was called to the front of the stage twice to acknowledge he applause.

Colonel Roosevelt Responds

Colonel Roosevelt spoke of some intimate aspects of his father's love for nature. He said it began when his father was very young and he recalled a family story of how his elder sister objected when she found he was keeping some dead mice in the family icebox.

Colonel Roosevelt revealed that his father had told him that he once almost decided to become a professional naturalist. Throughout his father's life, he said, natural history was always "his greatly loved avocation." He said that he was sure his father would have been very proud of the building erected in his honor.

Dr. James R. Garfield, president of the Rooseyelt Memorial Commission and Secretary of the Interior in Theodore Roosevelt's Cabinet, said the great purposes of his former leader's life were "to afford men more equal chance with their fellows to make the most out of life and to improve the conditions under which people work and live."

"He strove for social and economic justice, not theoretical but practical, pointing the way for the attainment of measures in State and nation which would make it possible to care for illness, accident, death, old age, unemployment," Dr. Garfield said.

Dr. Charles W. Flint, chancellor of Syracuse University, pronounced the benediction.

Forty-Year-Old Melodrama Still A Tear-Jerker Despite Its Age

When "Way Down East," now at the Imperial theater, went on the stage 40 years ago, handkerchieves were openly brought out of pockets and purses and openly unfurled. When this tear-jerking melodrama became a silent movie, handkerchieves were slid out of pockets and somewhat stealthily moved to eyes and noses. Now that the old favorite has been picked up and made into a talkie by Fox, a sophisticated generation will blink and bite the tears away and only the more sentimental will need their handkerchieves.

For "Way Down East" still tugs at the heart. It is a love story based on the ageless conflict between stern, rockbound morality and the spirit of forgiveness and liberality. Fox has taken the rather worn plot—a once erring girl who has eaten her heart out with remorse and suffering, is fighting for another chance at happiness—and turned into a good movie with well turned situations, pictorial beauty, and good acting.

The camera has touched lovingly the beauty in simple life on a well stocked, well paying, and productive farm. The homely scenes are treated with nostalgic tenderness.

The picture stars Rochelle Hudson and Henry Fronda with Slim Summerville Edward Trevor, Margaret Hamilton and Andy Devine in the chief supporting roles. Appearing from nowhere, Miss Hudson applies for and is given work on Russell Simpson's farm. She gets the job from stern Squire Simpson when she tells him and his wife how she makes pumpkin pie. "Anyone who can tell my wife anything about cooking is pretty good," the Squire thinks and takes the girl without too much questioning of her past life.

As Anna, the hired girl, Miss Hudson soon wins the love of the Squire's son but she doesn't, for some mysterious reason, return this love. The reason becomes apparent as a malicious gossip brings tales of the girl's dubious past to the Squire's ears. At first he refuses to believe but investigates and finds the story true. He orders the girl from his home as soon as he learns the facts. It is night and the girl leaves in the face of a bitter blizzard.

She looses her way on the river, just as the ice is breaking. Her rescue is a thrilling bit of play, with a suspense nicely sustained. The Squire himself is one of the rescuers but when the girl is saved just as she is about to go under in the ice break, he refuses to forgive her. His wife pleads for the girl and his son vows to marry her anyway. The picture of course has the happy ending.

Scenes are laid in the New England of the 1890's. There is an old fashioned quilting bee and an old fashioned skating party in the picture which bring back such songs as "Seeing Nellie Home"

Von Starhemberg Denies Seeking Austrian Throne

Vice-Chancellor Says Even Otto Won't Try For It Yet; Patriotic Unit Rallies

"Reports that I aspire to the Austrian throne are nonsense which shrieks to high heaven," Prince Ernst Rudiger von Starhemberg, Vice-Chancellor of Austria, declared in Vienna on Jan. 18 in a statement to Austrian and foreign newspaper men who had been summoned to hear from him an explanation of the nation-wide assembly of leaders of the Patriotic Front which was to be held the next day.

Starhemberg also denied that he wanted to become regent or that he would restore Archduke Otto, Hapsburg pretender, to the throne by a coup, according to Henry A. Diez in the New York Herald Tribune.

"If the monarchy is to be restored later in Austria, it can only be done legally and with due regard to all circumstances," he said. "In such a case, Otto is the only candidate who could become monarch, for the coronation of a usurper would lead to internal disorder. For this reason, I never have thought of becoming king myself, and I never will do it."

The Vice-Chancellor said that Otto would not lend himself to such an "adventurous experiment" as attempting to be crowned at present.

He was applauded by the Austrian newspaper men present when he replied to the query of a German writer as to whether a national plebiscite was in prospect. He said plebiscites were "primarily a problem of propaganda and money, and Austria is not going to compete against the money subsidies which the German Nazi government would send to Austria in such a case."

Starhemberg explained that the Patriotic Front rally had been called to discuss the welding into a uniform group of all the various groups taken into that organization. He said that no internal or external changes of program were intended, and that the late Chancellor Engelbert Dollfuss's policies would be continued.

Berlin Renews Anti-Austria Drive

A resurgence of the anti-Austrian press campaign occurred in Berlin on Jan. 18 when Nazi evening newspapers displayed on their front pages a dispatch from Vienna giving the text of an illegal propaganda leaflet distributed the day before by Austrian Nazis at Vienna.

The leaflet bitterly condemned the regime of Chancellor Kurt Schuschnigg and Vice-Chancellor Ernst Rudiger von Starhemberg, asserting that they maintained themselves in power only through forcible suppression and alien assistance, and that thousands of Austria's best citizens had been outlawed and thrown into jail. It demanded a free election in Austria to determine the will of the people.

The wide publicity given the pamphlet here may incite Austrian Nazis, who generaly have been quiet lately, to a new onslaught on the Austrian regime. Less excitable observers here, however, scout the possibility that Chancellor Adolf Hitler is prepared to take drastic measures in Austria.

Blow at Little Entente Seen

It is said to be more likely that publication of the leaflet is a maneuver intended to counteract the effect of Schuschnigg's visit this week to Prague and the budding rapprochement between Austria and the Little Entente nations (Szechoslovakia Yugoslavia and Rumania).

However, if the pamphlet does start trouble in Vienna, Berlin must be held responsible, because it has been fairly well established that the Nazis in Austria are controlled from the German capital. Moreover, Hitler cannot plead that the Nazi press and not the Nazi government is responsible, for the press throughout the Reich is carefully controlled.

Telephonic information from Vienna tonight indicated that distribution of the pamphlet there, where leaflets often are distributed, had not created a sensation. Informed Austrians also said that the report that "hundreds of thousands" of copies of the leaflet had been distributed was greatly exaggerated.

Berlin apparently has its own reasons for giving the whole matter such great importance. Five Berlin evening papers published the identical dispatch from Vienna without comment. The message was not attributed to the German official news agency.

EXPLANATION OF TODAY'S CARTOON

The White King Of The Zulus

John Dunn, born in 1839, white chief of Zululand, is to be numbered among the most picturesque adventurers of Africa. He was a cattle driver at the age of 14. Before he came of age, he was elected one of the chieftains of Zululand. At the outbreak of the Zulu War, Dunn was the ruler of a large territory and the head of a considerable family. He acquired 40 wives, buying them on the cattle exchange plan. These wives bore him a total of 120 children of whom 79 are living today. During the Zulu War, (1879) Dunn, at the head of 200 warriors, joined the British against the Zulus. Out of gratitude, the British Government assigned a large territory to Dunn. Out of this territory every descendant of Dunn is entitled to 100 acres today. The Natal Government has recently confirmed this grant.

Baby Talk Handicaps Infants, Doctor Says

Baby talk came in for some hard words in Chicago, Ill., recently.

Parents who indulge in it, when talking to baby, drew a frown from Dr. Frederick W. Brown of Floral Park, N. Y., who told the annual American speech correction convention that this means trouble, according to the New York Times.

"Poor comprehension in children of the seventh and eighth grades has been traced to the fact that they were baby talkers in infancy," he said.

"To encourage it, or indulge children in it, will retard and may impair their general learning."

An explanation of stuttering, as based upon "a desire to express infant non-speech sounds," was offered to the convention by Dr Smiley Blanton of Cornell University, who said:

"It is such early sounds as gurgling and suckling, breaking through again. The stutterer dramatizes an unconscious conflict between the desire to express them and the adult necessity of suppressing their primitive expression."

This desire to revert to the pre-speech stage showed up in many who did not stutter, Dr. Blanton told the convention. That, he said, was what made men chew pipe stems or cigars, smack their lips, and eat noisily.

"That is why the table manners of men are, on the whole, much worse than those of women."

No Admission

A candidate addressing his constituency was surprized by a voice which, calling from the back of the hall, said: "Well, I don't care what you say, I wouldn't vote for you if you were the angel Gabriel."

Came the reply: "If I were the angel Gabriel, you wouldn't be in my constituency."—Troy (N. Y.) Times Record.

New Evolution Theory Deals With Inanimate

active formaldehyde this acid combines to form a whole series of compounds which are the commonest constituents of plants and animals—pyridine, purine and alpha amino acids.

"Natural Forces" Gave Sources

"There exists scarcely a doubt that during long periods of earth history, preceding the appearance of living matter, many localized areas of the earth's surface provided suitable conditions for the synthesis of sugar and some amino acids.

"Thus the natural forces at work on the earth's surface prior to the appearance of living matter had almost certainly already provided a variety of both inorganic and organic compounds characteristically utilized by living matter, including the particular sugar, glucose, from which most living matter still derives an obligatory flow of free energy, and some alpha amino acids which must serve as building blocks for the protein which is the chief constituent of living matter.

"These syntheses of organic matter wholly apart from life are facts which must now be utilized in dealing with the question of the origin of life. Any general biological instruction that fails nowadays to direct attention to these facts is vitally deficient in its presentation of modern life-science.

"The longest single missing span may be that reaching from spontaneously formed sugars and amino that of a virus.

"Studies of the past thirty years on the structure and functions of the brain, and on the relation of other parts of the body to brain function, have resolved but a fraction of the primary problem of the mind, but the mind has been firmly placed in an evolutionary frame, and several gaps in our knowledge formerly filled by myth or magic have been displaced by veritable experience.

Development of Consciousness

"The consciousness of dog and man has evolved, and redevelops in every ontogeny, in the same unbroken way that the function of the digestive or glandular system has evolved. The evidence on this important point today is probably stronger than that adduced in 1859—when Darwin published "The Origin of Species'—for the principle of evolution.

"Consciousness, as well as some related subconscious phenomena, is associated with organization at a high biological level, and chiefly, though not solely, with the organization of the brain."

In discussing what he termed the difficulties encountered by competent teachers of the life sciences in providing the younger generation with the advances of knowledge gained every year in the research laboratories, Dr. Riddle said:

"In any consideration of this matter it is unquestionable that it was traditional religion that thus invoked the heavy hand of legislation. It is equally clear that elsewhere, without invoking the law but with its extended and varied influence, traditional religion is now effecting a widespread repression of the teaching of this central principle of biology in public schools through the United States and in practically all other civilized countries as well.

"In this country it sometimes forces the resignation of able zoologists even from college positions, and in high schools and late primary grades there are probably today few places where straightforward teaching of the unmitigated evolution principle can be done except at the peril of the teacher.

Parochial Schools Criticized

"It is obvious that an eviscerated straw-man is set up in place of the reality for the younger students of denominational and parochiel schools everywhere. In this country this means that many millions of our present and future citizens are robbed of a biological outlook, or they get one that is warped and unrecognizable, through direct responsibility of the church, while with somewhat less directness the same agency widely exercises a restraint upon effective biological teaching in the public schools.

"Biologists in nearly all countries, and particularly in our own, have tried a compromise with religious creeds. That compromise has failed. Most youth of 1936, like those of 1859, leave our schools without having opportunity to learn that the worthy facts concerning man's origin and destiny come not from religious traditions but from biological investigations made within the time of men now living. modern youth of opportunity to learn what is known concerning his or her place in nature.

"In what is said here I am not concerned with the question whether religion is important; nor whether one or another of the creeds of the earth has or has not sufficiently "adjusted" its teachings to modern knowledge; nor whether one or another of them is good, bad, or quite indifferent. But whatever the answer to those questions the present restrictive influence of organized religion on the teaching of the best of biology is intolerable.

"Such an influence, from whatever source, is too highly harmful and dangerous to the well-being of man—to modern beehive aggregations of men who live under ever multiplied rules and laws which must wreck us if based on variegated tradition instead of upon a common knowledge

"For moribund traditional beliefs to continue to exercise such influence over the educational program of a country is a confession and declaration either of the apathy, the cowardice, the impotence, or the intellectual bankruptcy in that country.

Traditionalists Also in Schools

"The tongues of the traditionalists are heard not merely from pulpits, but they echo also within our schools—the only possible home of science—and there they now curb or tie the tongues of biologic truth.

"This confusion is party sustained—or at least the voices of tradition are prolonged and made more plausible—but the words of great authorities in one or another branch of learning. Today, as at Oxford in 1860, a professor can easily be had to support a bishop against a really good and far-reaching biological advance.

"The public cannot fix relative volues to the words of different scientific men. The biologist who has learned the texture and ways of living stuff knows well enough, however, that when renowned physicists and astronomers elect to speak about life they really do this as laymen—and all too frequently their words are unconsciously filled with tradition, a thing which they also acquired as laymen.

"In addition to these volunteer voices from quite outside life-science, we are all aware that some high authorities in one or another branch of biological science persistently ignore the greater biologic accomplishment, and on some points they too still speak with tongues of a day that is gone. We may as well have it out with them.

"The issue today is whether the case and the course of civilization are to be guided by knowledge or by the dead hands of the past; whether the biological investigator of either yesterday or today may be permitted to give his best results to the world or whether he is to be own progress; whether, indeed, present man-in-the-mass has evolved sufficiently to prefer light to twilight, truth to tradition."

Church Boycotts Mexican Schools

them to be given to you.

"Nothing of this is new for you, venerable brothers and beloved children, since in various forms it has all been explained in previous documents; but we wished to repeat it again more concretely to avoid the most serious harms which may be caused to your souls, and especially those of children, by those who lend themselves to do evil for the sake of a little money; those who without heeding our instructions or what natural reason itself dictates, sow confusion on all sides, and those who with their spirits very far from that of the true disciple of Jesus Christ, dishonor their religion and cause irreparable damage to souls.

"The many years of laic instruction and public laicism have produced a generation impregnated with indifference toward religion; but the church has true life in itself and can again transform our beloved country, and it will do so with the blessing of God if sincere and decided Catholics faithfully fulfil their duties and aid others to do so.

"In a special manner we instruct those who have wordly goods and persons of education to make efforts to aid the diffusion of Christian instruction and education.

"Catholics should understand that for solidarity they should work uniformly in accordance with the principles and methods set forth, remembering well that the present generation is responsible before God and man for the conservation or destruction of the faith in our loved country.

"We pray most sincerely to the sacred heart of Jesus and to our most excellent Lady of Guadalupe to illuminate those who have the grave responsibility of watching over the welfare of the nation, so that, leaving the path of error which leads only to degradation and misery, they may give the true guarantees and liberties which we need to achieve the peace, tranquillity, culture and prosperity of our beloved country."

Disks Of Ice Are Used As Coin To Trick Meter

London gas company inspectors, accustomed to finding tin disks, medals, buttons and foreign coins in gas meters, give the palm for originality to a business man who has been using disks made of ice, says the New York Herald-Tribune.

"Large amounts of gas had been used by this consumer," an official of the company explained, "but whenever the collector called to empty the meter few coins were found. It was noticed too that the meter was exceptionally damp.

"Investigation convinced us that the consumer had been dropping ice disks in the slot instead of coins."

A large number of distinguished guests attended the Memorial meeting for the late George Woodward Wickersham held under the auspices of the America-Japan Society, the Japanese-American Relations Committee and St. Luke's International Medical Center at Holy Trinity church Monday afternoon.

Those on the program were Prince Iyesato Tokugawa, representing the America-Japan Society, Mr. Kensuke Horinouchi, who read a message from the Minister of Foreign Affairs, Mr.

The Late George W. Wickersham

Koki Hirota, and Baron Yoshiro Sakatani, representing the Japanese-American Relations Committee and the Japanese Advisory Council of St. Luke's International Medical Center, and the American Ambassador, Mr. Joseph C. Grew.

Members of the committee in charge of the plans were: Mr. T. Komatsu and Mr. Takeda, of the America-Japan Society, Dr. Kubo and Dr. Herbert Bowles of St. Luke's International Medical Center, Dr. Obata, of the Japanese-American Relations Committee, and Mr. Russell Durgin and Mr. Saito, of the Y.M.C.A.

Among the distinguished persons were Baron Kijuro Shidehara, Count Aisuke Kabayama, Mr. Tokutaro Sakai, Admiral Yoshitake Uyeda, former Japanese naval attache in Washington, Mr. Tsunekichi Azabuki, the American counsellor, Mr. Edwin L. Neville, the American Naval Attache and Mr. Fred Rogers, the American military attache, Lieutenant-Colonel W. Carey Crane, the American acting consul-general, Mr. J. Holbrook Chapman, Mr. Carl Boehringer of the American commercial attache's office staff, Mrs. Rudolph Bolling Teusler, Miss Mildred Teusler, nearly all the nurses, doctors and other officials of St. Luke's International Medical Center, and many Japanese and Americans of the America-Japan Society, and the Japanese-American Relations Committee, in addition to those on the committee.

Mr. Wickersham, attorney general of the United States during the Taft administration, died while riding in a taxicab in New York at 1:15 p.m. January 25. He was 77 years old. Death was due to heart failure. The taxi driver, who was the first to discover the death, was acquainted with Mr. Wickersham, having frequently driven him and his wife to Sunday services at St. George's church.

Mr. Wickerham was an idealist who fought hard in defense of those ideals. His attitude on the League of Nations, the World Court, and International Conciliation bore that out. He was also a reformer, who bitterly attacked the systems of law enforcement in this country and pleaded for more humane treatment for prisoners

Mr. Wickersham had a tremendous capacity for work, and whatever he undertook he carried out with a thoroughness that was one of his most marked characteristics. It was partly for that reason and partly because of his integrity and ability he was appointed chairman of the National Commission on Law Observance and Law Enforcement, which was more popularly known as the Wickersham Commission, from 1929 to 1931.

The main conclusions were that the criminal law enforcement machinery in the United States was entirely inadequate and that the annual cost of crime was $1,000,000,000. Prohibition, however, was the matter which was most closely watched, and when the report, covering some 80,000 words and containing the individual opinions of the commission members, was published in January, 1931, the majority condemned the "noble experiment."

The chairman, however, did not share that opinion. With three of his colleagues, Mr. Wickersham favored further trial under the Eighteenth Amendment and the national prohibition act. Less than two years later he admitted that prohibition had been a failure and urged that prohibition had been a failure and urged that regulation take its place.

The lengthy report which bears his name was much criticized. Observers in London described it as a "curious and baffling document." Will Rogers, in one of his daily press observations, axed satirical, saying:

"I was down in Texas last week and they are feeding goats the Wickersham report."

Later Mr. Rogers conceded: "Anyhoo, him and his gang wasn't loafing."

In 1873 Mr. Wickersham entered the School of Civil Engineering at Lehigh University, remaining there for two years. After a short interval he went to the University of Pennsylvania, where he studied law and was graduated in 1880 with the degree of LL.B. That same year he was admitted to the bar of Pennsylvania and practised his profession. During this period Mr. Wickersham edited The Weekly Notes of Cases, a publication devoted to court affairs in Pennsylvania.

Mr. Wickersham packed his law books and moved to New York City in 1882, becoming managing clerk of the law firm of Strong & Cadwalder. Four years later he was admitted to partnership in the firm and became well acquainted with Henry W. Taft, who was also a member of the concern.

From 1887 until 1909 Mr. Wickersham was extremely active. He was counsel for the New York State Savings Bank and a member of the committee which carried through the reorganization of the Chicago traction lines. He was also counsel for the construction company which built the first subway in New York and general counsel for the Interborough Rapid Transit Company. Among his many legal connections were those of S. Pearson and Son, the contractors who built the four tunnels under the East River for the Pennsylvania Railroad. He was one of counsel for the readjustment managers in connection with the merger under the auspices of the Mexican Government of the Mexican Central and the National Railroad of Mexico Railways Company.

As Attorney General in Mr. Taft's administration, Mr. Wickersham proved to be one of the most energetic and hardest workers among the President's advisers. He was particularly active in problems affecting railroads, trusts and corporations and prospective legislation concerning them. He was the author of the Federal incorporation bill and of the amendment to the Interestats Commerce law creating the Commerce Court.

During August and September 1918, Mr. Wickersham was special commissioner of the War Trade Board to Cuba, and in 1919 he was a member of President Wilson's second industrial conference. He was active as a member of the Committee on Progressive Codification of International Law appointed by the Council of the League of Nations in 1924. He was also on the commission on reorganization of the New York State Government in 1925 and 1926.

When the World War broke out Mr. Wickersham was a propagandist in favor of the Allies. He was enthusiastic regarding the League of Nations, and when the United States declined to be a member of that body he joined John Hessin Clare to further that movement and the World Court.

In 1923 he accepted the invitation of the French Government to visit Algiers and Morocco to study colonial administrative methods. Upon his return he wrote a series of articles recording his impressions.

When Senator Lodge proposed a substitute for the Permanent Court of International Justice, Mr. Wickersham wrote that "no such piece of buffoonery ever has been brought forward by a responsible statesman," adding that it was "a thing of shreds and patches."

Mr. Wickerham was very active in his work for prison reform. He was president of the National Probation Association in 1928 and 1929, and was also vice president of the Council of the International Union of League of Nations Societies. He was one of the influential lay members of the Protestant Episcopal Church and devoted much time and energy to the campaign to raise money for the building of the Cathedral of St. John the Divine.

Preached Conciliation

For years Mr. Wickersham preached conciliation between this country and Japan. He was president of the Japan Society in 1932 and 1933. During that period he was also chairman of the board of directors of the New York State Economic Council, and a member of the Municipal Art Commission of New York.

As a lawyer, Mr. Wickersham distinguished himself by singular clarity of expression. His diction was not so much of the law as of the library, however. He read French, Spanish and Italian, and enjoyed the works of Dante in the original. He was a collector of French engravings and old English mezzotints, and a patron of the opera and the concert halls.

Honorary degrees were conferred upon Mr. Wickersham by the University of Pennsylvania, Harvard, Lehigh and Hobart College. He was an Officer of the Legion of Honor. In 1883 he married Miss Mildred Wendell of Washington, daughter of Cornelius Wendell, who was government printer during the administration of Andrew Johnson.

Britain Likely To Aid Migration To Australia

have altered the position considerably. Most of the British unemployed would have been absorbed, and Australia would probably have hundreds of thousands more inhabitants."

Greater Home Market

The home market is still another factor prompting the urge to a revival of migration. Production in Australia has far outstripped consumption. The present huge dependence on oversea markets is too big a risk to Australian economic development.

It is considered that a greater home market would solve many of the problems with which Australia will be confronted during the next decade. A larger population would mean more goods consumed, both primary and secondary. The farming community has always favored immigration. A new development is that the secondary (manufacturing) industries are swinging into line with the primary producers.

Need of Population

At a Chamber of Manufacturers banquet here recently, nearly all the speakers emphasized Australia's need of population. The emphasis laid on this point may have been pre-arranged. The Minister for Customs, Thomas White, summed up these speeches when he said:

"Prosperity in Australia will attract artisans from Britain and Europe, who would be assets not only because they would reduce overhead expenditure in the general development of the country, and the national debt, but also as consumers of primary and secondary products."

Another significant fact is that several patriotic societies are combining in a campaign to obtain the resumption of British immigration.

Quick AAA Refund Is Ordered By U.S. Court of all Federal taxes and imperil the normal functioning of government.

Mr. Reed brought forward the section of the revised statutes forbidding injunctions against collection of Federal taxes, and contrasted this with the rice millers decision which held that the injunctions were valid because the collections were "exactions" improperly called taxes.

The section barring injunctions against tax collections reads:

"No suit for the purpose of restraining the assessment or collection of any tax shall be maintained in any court."

The Solicitor General contended that this action applied both to taxes and to such "exactions" as those involved in the rice cases.

"In Bailey v. George," he said, "this court held that Section 3224 prohibited enjoining the collection of an amount which on the same day in another case (child-labor tax case) had been decided to be not a tax but an unconstitutional 'exaction' to regulate transactions, the control of which by the Constitution had been reserved to the States.

"As this is the same situation existing in the instant cases, we respectfully submit that the opinion and judgment of this court directing that an injunction be granted by the District Court are erroneous and inconsistent with the intent and purpose of the statute as construed in Bailey v. George."

Calls the Parallel Striking

The parallel between Bailey v. George and the rice cases was "striking" Mr. Reed remarked.

"In each," he said, "it was alleged that:

"(1) The exaction was unconstitutional.

"(2) The collection of the exaction was threatened.

"(3) The collection would result in irreparable damage.

"(4) An injunction should be granted permanently enjoining collection.

"In each the collector relied upon the provisions of Section 3224 as depriving the courts of jurisdiction; in each case there was an adequate remedy at law consisting of a suit for refund after payment; in each case the decision was reached in the light of a holding that the imposing statute was unconstitutional; in each case the exaction had not been paid and the decision that the imposing statute was invalid effectively prevented a collection thereafter. A departure from the rule in Bailey v. George is not required to insure the return of impounded funds to the taxpayer if the court desires to accomplish that result.

"As Bailey v. Gorge is not mentioned or distinguished, it seems certain that the opinion in the present cases will be construed by other courts, in cases raising the constitutionality of tax legislation, as overruling that decision.

"The decisions in the instant cases are of the gravest importance in that they involve the construction and applicability of Section 3224. The importance of preserving the rule of Bailey v. George cannot be overemphasized.

"Any impairment of the force of that decision or departure from the principle of Section 3224 would destroy essential safeguards to the orderly and uninterrupted collection of all Federal taxes and imperil the normal functioning of government."

Stating that the petition was presented in good faith and not for delay, Mr. Reed asked that it be granted, the mandate stayed and the decree of the district court in the rice cases affirmed.

Ready to Refund in Chicago

N. Y. Times

CHICAGO, Jan. 20. — Chicago packers and other processors will be told to come and get some $47,000,000 in contested AAA processing texes as a result of action taken by the Supreme Court today in denying the government a rehearing and in issuing a mandate covering its decision in the rice millers case.

District Attorney Michael L. Igoe this afternoon informed the United States district judges here that the mandate has been issued. Earlier Judge Charles E. Woodward, William H. Holly and Philip L. Sullivan had followed the lead of Judge James H. Wilkerson in declining to release cash and bonds until the mandate had been issued.

Federal Judge John P. Barnes on Thursday entered orders releasing in excess of $7,500,000 in cash and bonds.

The first checks actually to be handed processors, so far as could be learned, were one for $2,870 and one for $40,847 made out to S Friender and Sons Co. of Cincinnati, a tobacco importing company.

Armour and Co. was reported to have received a check for $1,100,000 today, but officers of the company said they had not yet seen it. They expected to get the full amount of their claims, about $12,000,000.

Yugoslavia Issues New Bills

Difficulties in the rural regions in getting change for 1,000-dinar notes, worth about $20, induced the Yugoslavian government to issue 500-dinar bills recently. No currency expansion is involved as enough 1,000-dinar notes are being withdrawn to make up for the new issue.

Colombia Fears Red Domination

Federal Authorities Pledge Aid To Antioquia In Fight Against Labor Agitators

That the Left Liberal government of Colombia is alarmed at the rise of communism in the country is shown by a message from the Minister of Government to the Governor of the State of Antioquia with reference to the outlaw textile workers' strike at Envigado.

He charges that Colombian labor is a victim of anarchists, revolutionary unionists, Communists and Socialists, all acting independently and influencing the subversive course of the workers, according to the New York Times. This purpose has become clearer recently, he says, and the Communists, because of better organization and international revolutionary resources, apparently are gaining control.

"It is known," says the note, "that South America is a fertile field for subversive agitation, which prospers more in Colombia than elsewhere on account of the freedom of the press, speech and assembly."

He says the government knows that foreign agitators have entered Colombia, despite the government's vigilance, including experts in the organization of revolutionary forces. The Communist movement in Brazil and the discovery of a conspiracy in Chile recently confirm this charge, he adds.

Communism, he asserts, is openly intervening in all labor movements. By a firm attitude, he believes, the government must convince workers that the advisers of violence are deceiving them. The whole citizenry is warned against undermining collective security by supporting antinational and anti-social forces.

The Minister warns against believing Communist agitators' extravagant intentions of persecution of the workers and of violation of their constitutional rights.

"If it is true, as asserted, that the Extreme Leftists have united to foment rebellion in the country, even threatening life," he concludes, "this is the moment to oppose a national front to agitators for a class war."

He adds that the cooperation of labor and capital is even more important than the laws the government recently requested of Congress if communistic leadership of labor is to be avoided.

His message concludes with assurances that the national government is backing the authorities of Antioquia in their present firm handling of the strike there.

British King Binds The Vast Empire

the essential British interests of the world-wide domain, supplying for the people of this country the means to maintain a high standard of living in peacetime and making possible a large measure of cooperation for defense in war.

George V was an ideal ruler to carry the duties imposed upon a British monarch in the post-war developments within the empire. His steadiness, loyalty, fairness and common sense contributed to inspire a deep respect for the throne among radically minded dominion politicians. Certainly George, not the Dominions Secretary, represented in the eyes of Canadians, Australians and Africans the embodiment of imperial unity.

Will his successor continue this traditional self-denying devotion to service of the common interest? This question is anxiously put by British and imperial statesmen. Implications of a different attitude may have far-reaching consequences, possibly unfavorable to the continued existence of the British Empire.

The international situation also is influenced by the personality of the reigning monarch. However great his respect for constitutional forms and governments, the Kings of this country are always destined to play a considerable part in shaping the relations between nations, of Europe especially.

Europe looks to Britain first of all for stability in leadership. The interplay of political influences in this country leaves to the Crown a powerful steadying influences unnoticed by the public but loyally acknowledged by Ministers in power.

George in his quiet way played his part as universal moderator. Many times he discreetly intervened to prevent the government from indulging in some sudden gyration prejudicial to the traditional policy. European governments were fully aware of this beneficient influence and always included it in their calculations.

If by any chance the throne is occupied by a ruler inclined himself to add uncertainties by personal public intervention, or even a hint of preference one way or the other, the consequences to Britain's position in international affairs may be tragic.

George followed a situation closely, studied developments carefully and always was ready to steady his Ministers with advice and encouragement. He never was afraid to speak his mind in private, but with meticulous care avoided furnishing the slightest suspicion of unconstitutional interference.

There is no reason to suppose his successor will deflect from this logical course, because otherwise an element of instability would be introduced in international relations.

Highest Soviet Decoration Bestowed On Stakhanoff

Soviet Russia's highest honor, Lenin's Decoration, was awarded in Moscow recently to Alexei Stakhanoff, initiator of the "Stakhanoff movement" to increase industrial production.

The award was made in the Kremlin in the presence of Joseph Stalin and other high officials. Stakhanoff, who came to Moscow from his work in a coal mine to receive the decoration, was besieged in his hotel by admirers, says the New York Times.

U.S. Buys Planes For New Carriers

114 Torpedo-Bombers Contracted For; To Cost $3,636,000

Pressing a program which would almost double its present air fighting strength by 1942, the United States navy placed an order on Jan. 20 for 114 torpedo-bombers to be used on two new aircraft carriers scheduled for completion next year.

The contract, calling for an expenditure of $3,636,000 exclusive of engines, was awarded to the Douglas Aircraft Company of Santa Monica, Calif.

Today's purchase of new planes, high naval officials maintained, had no connection with the London Naval Conference failure to agree on a new naval limitation treaty but was in line with the administration's intention to build he American navy up to the full strength authorized by the Washington treaty.

To keep pace with increases in other branches of the navy toward the 1942 strength objective, a program for a total of 1,910 combat planes by that time is now being followed. At present the navy has 1,068 planes actually in service and 400 others contracted for.

Average necessary replacements amount to about 300 planes yearly.

In Present Roosevelt's recent budget message to Congress $27,600,000 was set aside in proposed new naval appropriations, plus unexpended funds on hand, for the purchase of new planes.

Although specifications, speed and other details of the new planes were kept secret, the Navy Department's announcement said the torpedobombers "will have markedly greater speed, considerably greater range as well as many improved characteristics of performance over previous types of this class."

The new sea fighters, which can carry either torpedoes or bombs, but not both, are of a new-type following land monoplane construction, powered by single engines. They are designed exclusively for service on airplane carriers.

Since completion of the new planes will about coincide with the dates on which the aircraft carriers Yorktown and Enterprise are due to be finished, navy officers said most, if not all, of them undoubtedly would be assigned to the new ships.

Boar's Head Graces Oxford College Fete

In the hall of Queen's College, Oxford University, England, on Christmas Day is yearly observed the ancient ceremony of ushering in the boar's head with the singing of a carol.

This custom, formerly common in the north of England, is probably of Norse origin in connection with the midwinter feast of Freyr, the Scandinavian god of peace and plenty, when a boar was sacrificed at Yuletide Tradition attaches it to Queen's College by connecting it with the deliverance of a student who, while walking in the neighboring forest of Shotover and studying Aristotle, was attacked by a wild boar, which rushed at him open-mouthed. The student crammed his book down the brute's throat, with the words "Graecum est," and choked him thus escaping his threatened doom according to the New York Times.

The preparations of the ceremony begin some day before Christmas, when the head cook and his assistants make ready the boar's head, which sometimes weighs as much as ninety pounds, and when dressed and garlanded upon the great silver salver, turns the scale at considerably over a hundredweight.

When cooked, the head is trimmed and glazed and embellished with a crown upon its forehead, and an orange in its mouth. Several small banners bearing the arms of the college are stuck on each side of the crown and the dish is decorated with bay, laurel and rosemary.

At 6 o'clock on Christmas evening, the provost enters the hall followed by the fellows in residence who all take their places at the high table. The provost recites the college grace, and there emerges from the buttery a procession consisting of the trumpeter, the taberdar appointed to sing the solo of the carol, the choristers belonging to the college and the servitors bearing the boar's head upon its massive salver on their shoulders.

The trumpeter sounds a call twice, and the chorus of the carol is heard outside. When the dish is placed on the high table, the provost takes the ornaments and embellishments from the head and presents them to the choir boys and visitors.

Persia Adopting Modern Methods; Beauty Remains

every town notified of our arrival we received the most courteous of welcomes and full facilities to see its beauties.

Motor-buses now carry the people across the wide spaces between the towns. I bless the fact that these fine roads are few and far between; I do not want the camel caravan swept into the limbo of the past, as it soon may be.

The railway from Bandar Shah, winding through towering mountain passes to Firuzkuh, is due to reach Teheran within a year. With it a further wave of modernization rushes in. Schools abound, with hordes of little boys rushing out in chauffeur's caps, grasping learned attache cases. That they learn something is shown by the fact that one small youth in Yezd, talking to an American friend of mine, knew where New York and Boston were situated. The disappearance of the chader (a sheet worn as a shawl by men and sometimes by women) may take time. Age-long customs cannot be uprooted in a moment, nor traditions of centuries be torn out of the heart in a second. For all that modernization cannot be held back—the seeds are sown.

We should be tolerant of the slow and halting steps made by Eastern countries. Faults are committed that must be repaired, but strivings after better things should be encouraged. In their desire to model themselves on European standards, we should encourage a nation like the Persians, whose present ruler has built up a powerful central Government working effectively throughout the country. Never were stable Governments more necessary in this distracted world. In the newly erected House of Parliament there is a machine which taps out the names of all incoming members, also of those absent, on whom a fine is imposed. I felt that the same device, if it could be installed at Westminster, would produce a substantial fund for some useful purpose from the non-attendant members of both Houses.

My father's two volumes were a fitting tribute to the splendors of Persia. Every one of those monuments must be preserved for ever and not allowed to perish in the sands of time. Fortunately, there are signs everywhere that this is being done. In 1931 some 20 buildings were under repair. Now all the important monuments are scheduled for repairs, and money which entails a real sacrifice is being spent on them.

Glories of Old Iran

If Teheran must be the great modern metropolis, I want Isfahan, Meshd, Kum, Kashan, Shiraz to be left with some of their past glories.

To see Isfahan alone is worth the journey—Isfahan, with her three great mosques, the absorbing bazaars, and the great open square where the goal-posts still testify to the game of polo played there centuries gone by. Until one has seen the colouring of those blue-green and yellow tiles, one can never realize their sumptuous and dazzling richness. The Mosque of Sultaniyeh, near Kazvin, is one of the noblest examples of the perfect interchange of turquoise and sapphire blue tiling. Ardistan has a ruined mosque with a stucco design in its interior which is breath-taking in its delicacy. Bostam, with its blue domes and highly ornate minaret, is one of the most perfect jewels in the whole of Persia. Shiraz, with the tombs of Hafiz and Saadi, is loveliest from the mountain pass, when one gazes down on her gardens, and her brilliant colored domes. The 700-mile road from Teheran to Meshed abounds in mosques and tomb towers, as at Semnan, Damghan, and Gadamgah, rich in design and color. Minarets with bewildering design and intricacy of detail rear their rigid heads from endless barren plains. The great Sassanian rock reliefs of Nagsheh Rostan are worth the donkey ride across bog and river to look on their superb charging horses and magnificently caparisoned warriors. It is these glories that draw us to Persia.

I am aware of the immense service the police posts in every town have rendered in rounding up bandits, deserters, and objectionable characters; but can I suggest that these posts should be removed now that the dangers are past? I find my Baedeker courage melting at the fifth or sixth police post of the day, when the patrol gazes at my passport, as if he could hardly read, asking me the date of my mother's birthday and my father's age.

This is not worthy of what Persia is setting out to do. There would be less complaint if these police agents could read competently and send one on one's way in a few moments. I make this complain because the Persians frequently told me of their desire to see their country opened up to tourists. The police system would deter many of the less brave spirits. It did not deter me, as it is only one of the errors I am pleading should be accepted for a while with patience and tolerance, instead of ribaldry and sarcasm, in the hope that it will eventually disappear.

It was a very happy hour and one that will be remembered by all who were present.

Mrs. Helm, President of the Club, thanked Mrs. Macdonald Smith, the dramatic Chairman, for arranging the program, anw Mr. Walker for giving the program. Paris Asking If British King Is Close Friend

tinues:

Expected to Enter Politics

In the subsequent stagnation of the sanctions despite the refusal of English public opinion to accept the Laval-Hoare plan, the French see, beyond a question to them, the effect of royal influence. Hence they ask that if so cautious and conventional a sovereign can have such a decisive influence on the destiny of nations, what can be expected of a younger man who may endeavor to make his weight felt? Without having anything very tangible to base their opinion on, the French nevertheless believe Edward VIII will take a more active part in politics. Behind the numerous expressions of confidence, fathered by the wish, that the new King will prove a Francophile, it is possible to discern a lurking fear lest this confidence be belied.

With his ready gift for facing the worst, the bellicose royalist, Charles Murras, prescribed in "L'Action Francaise" the following cure for incipient Francophobia: "A good navy, numerous and strong submarines, with powerful seaplanes and swift, well armored battleships would be the best way to foster the esteem and admirtion of the gracious sovereign for our country."

Believed Pro-League

Leon Bailby expresses the confidence that the new King will not deny himself the privileges of his grandfather. "No doubt during the recent months he has become somewhat chilly toward us, but he will come back," he says. "It is not a rupture; it is a friendly quarrel." This alludes to the impression prevalent here that the pro-League policy so ardently pursued by Captain Anthony Eden during the first months of autumn was close to the new King's heart, and that his instinct and his outlook align him with the younger generation of men in England who fought through the war.

It is recalled that he was present at the dramatic debate in the House of Commons last month when Sir Samuel resigned and the government disowned the Laval-Hoare pact.

The Right-Wing papers in general evinced doubts of Edward's responsiveness to the Franco-British entente. "Le Journal des Debats," for example, declared: "The quality we must hope for in the young King is the ability to sense danger."

"L'Echo de Paris," however, declares unflinchingly: "He loves our country as did his father and grandfather, whom he so much resembles."

Others take the viewpoint that the King will impose the calming of passions on the principle that he will be anxious not to risk war in the opening months of his reign.

The following is a story written by Joseph Driscoll from London the New York Herald Tribune:

"When I am King I shall do three things:

"I shall pass a law against cutting puppy dogs' tails.

"I shall not let them use bearing reins on horses.

"And then I shall do away with all sin in the world."

The pensive little boy who confided that to old Lord Roberts now sits on Great Britain's throne as powerful as any constitutional monarch can be, and all the King's horses, dogs and loyal subjects are rejoicing. With the death of that grown-up boy's father Great Britain has passed from the Georgian period into the new Edwardian age, and mourning over King George V is giving way to the confidence that the young man of action, Edward VIII, can do great things for the Empire.

He Makes Innovations

By this time King Edward doubtless has changed his mind about abolishing sin, considering how well intrenched sin is. Yet in his first week as King he already has indicated that he is not content to let things remain as they are.

His first known act was significant. No sooner had his father died at Sandringham House than Edward ordered the clock there set right. For thirty years Sandringham's clocks had run a half hour ahead. Edward VII so decreed, and his cutiful son, George V, carried on, never questioning why or wherefore. But Edward VIII saw no sense in it, and being no respector of meaningless customs he insisted that Sandringham's clocks keep time with the rest of the British Isles.

His independence again was reflected when he flew from Sandringham to London to address the Privy Council which acclaimed his accession to the throne. Edward likes flying, both as a sport and as a means of traveling quickly. He made his first flight in 1918 in an army airship.

But in recent years he has been under pressure from Prime Minister Stanley Baldwin and other advisers to stay closer to the earth. What is more natural than that, as soon as he became King, he again should take to the air to show his determination to live his own life.

Not satisfied with being the first British King to fly, Edward set another precedent when he returned to Sandringham. Weather conditions preventing another flight, he went by ordinary train, mingling with the other passengers instead of chartering a special train, as his father and grandfather would have done.

The new King created another precedent by using the rst person singular in his first address to the House of Commons. Where Queen Victoria used "we" and King George talked of himself in the third person as "the King," Edward VIII came right out and said "I" twice.

May Continue Travels

Edward is expected to assert his own will further by traveling abroad whenever his health or his pleasure dictates. Medical men say George V, suffering from bronchial catarrh, might have prolonged his life and he fled England's damp, foggy winters into some land of sunshine. Edward likes the Riviera, and few expect him to remain a hermit in England when the sun is shining elsewhere.

Edward is a great traveler, his total mileage being 300,000 miles, or twice his father's. Edward has been in every British possession in Africa but one, and he has made speeches in English, Afrikans, Swahili and French.

Clews to Edward's policies may be found in his speeches in recent years. Some of his remarks follow:

On America—"The Atlantic Ocean has grown noticeably smaller. . . . People of these two great countries are frowing ever more anxious to join hands across it."

War—"We learned a lot of lessons, the most important of which was that there should be no question or chance of another war."

Discipline—"It has always been a mystery to me how a certain number of people feel that the only way they can express the feeling we all have about war is by discouraging any form of healthy discipline and training."

Housing—"Slums are a slur on our civilization."

Clothes—"I would wear a different suit for every man I meet if it would help British trade."

Big game hunting—"It is better to film a lion than to kill him."

Russian drama—"Plays where they spend three hours talking about life without bothering to live."

Son and heir—"It has always seemed to me luckier to be born the eldest son. You haven't got to wear any of your brothers' old clothes."

Marriage—"I don't think any man should marry before he is thirty-two."

End Of Wars Sure, Mrs. Catt Asserts

separation of war from other questions and handling it as an isolated problem. Listing ostensible causes of conflict, she said that two score or more controversies in the last few years had been settled by peaceful means.

She then gave five "real reasons" for war—"Aroused primitive instincts; adherence to traditional use of war; failure to understand the possibilities of international machinery; studied lack of good neighborliness between nations and over-preparation for war."

Holds Causes Can Be Removed

"War is the world's greatest and most menacing evil," Mrs. Catt went on. "It is a handicap to human progress, a deterrent to friendly interrelationships between the States and the chief enemy of the human race. It is intertwined in all problems and confused with all controversies."

Citing the "outburst of indignation" against the "abortive Hoare-Laval peace proposals," Miss Courtney asserted that "it is not the government but the public which has led in the demand for the stopping of the Ethiopian war."

Previously Miss Courtney took issue with a statement made at the morning session by Felix Morley, editor of The Washington Post, who had said that "surely the most significant aspect of the Hoare-Laval proposals is the way in which this evidence of a reactionary governmental will was quickly overthrown by the instinctive surge forward of a progressive popular will, much of it coming, strangely enough, from this disinterested non-member nation."

Miss Courtney held that public opinion in the United States had relatively little to do with the British Government's reversal of its position on the peace proposals, and that British public opinion, responding to a slow but steady work of education, was the major factor.

Morley Hits Munitions Inquiry

Declaring that the major task today is that of "preventing a curious and most unholy trinity of isolationists, pacifists and jingoes from destroying what progress has been made since 1918," Mr. Morley denounced the investigation of munitions makers and international bankers as fomenters of war and declared that the pending neutrality legislation is "positively menacing to the work of the last sixteen years in the field of international relations."

EXPLANATION OF TODAY'S CARTOON

Most Remarkable Birth on Record

What is undoubtedly the most remarkable birth ever known, is the birth of a child to Mrs. Alton L. Jourdan of Gulf, N.C., at the bottom of a well 32 feet deep containing 10 feet of water. Mrs. Jourdan, who sends me this Believe It or Not story herself, says:

"On the afternoon of October 22, 1935, I went to our well to draw a bucket of water. I felt fine, but just as I poured the water and reached over to cover the well I fainted. I came to, to find myself swimming round to keep afloat in the bottom of the well. After a while I found a hand hold on the wall of the well, but could not hold on for long. My shouts and screams were not heard until 45 minutes later, when my husband, my nephew and farm hands came to my rescue. Just after my husband tied a rope around my body to lift me out I became unconscious, and next thing I remember, I was in the Lee County Hospital at Sanford—the mother of an eight-pound boy that was born while I was still in the water in the well."

After examination of the baby and mother they were found to be in good health, except for minor bruises on the mother's body, and the shock suffered from the fall. The fact that the baby was born under water but did not breathe until it had been removed from the water, accounts for its being alive today.

Comintern's Ultimate Objectives A Mystery justification to foreign governments, newspapers or speakers who criticize the Comintern.

Thus, at the last Comintern congress a representative of the American Communist party asserted that its efforts had succeeded in transforming an economic strike on the Pacific Coast into a political struggle, and added that the party would engineer strikes of a yet more revolutionary character and on a bigger scale before the end of the year. Neither of these statements may have been true, but the fact that they were made and received with applause at a meeting held in Moscow under the auspices of the Kremlin drew most emphatic protest from Washington against the "flagrant violation" of the Soviet-American agreement of November, 1933.

In considering the Comintern problem one is faced by three possibilities: First—Whatever the Comintern's status may originally have been, it is now little more than an appanage of Soviet power. It cannot be discarded or abolished, because it embodies one of the fundamental doctrines of Marxism. It also serves the Soviet Government as a safety-valve for the extreme and ultra-fanatical elements of the Communist party whose attitude might otherwise be embarrassing to the conduct of affairs at home and abroad.

Second—The Comintern, on the contrary, does indeed represent the ultimate goal and purpose of the Soviet State—namely, world revolution. As such it may for motives of policy be temporarily held in check, but it is nevertheless a real and potential danger of the most alarming character.

Third—The Comintern has indeed become secondary, as far as the present policies of the U. S. S. R. are considered, but might at a given time and for given reasons be restored once more to a position of great practical importance.

The chief argument in favor of the first of these possibilities is the historical fact that revolutionary movements, if successful, soon acquire a more conservative form, in the sense that the word "conservative" implies wishing to keep what one has got.

The French Revolution paralleled that of the Bolsheviki in at first being most extreme and in the existence of a desire to extend it to neighboring countries, but gradually, as the physical—that is military—power of France increased, the revolutionary phase became less marked, and finally may almost be said to have vanished when Robespierre was succeeded by the Directory.

It is not unreasonable to suppose that a similar evolution has been occurring in Russia as the Bolshevist authority has grown stronger and more stable. The authority has been concerned in keeping and developing which it has had rather than in undertaking new adventures. One might say that Stalin's policies have followed national lines.

In foreign affairs, too, Soviet policy has been conducted along lines more like those of the other great powers than like those of revolutionary communism. The U. S. S. R. is now linked with other countries by a series of pacts and agreements which in substance are not far different from the defensive alliances of an earlier period. This is certainly the case with Turkey and Persia and with France and Czechoslovakia. These understandings show how far the U. S. S. R. has traveled from the days when all foreign countries were regarded as enemies unless and until their capitalist or bourgeois governments had been overthrown by popular revolution.

Nevertheless, there are other factors in addition to these indications of Russian nationalism and of what might be called the evolution of the revolution.

First and foremost, there is the rigid Bolshevist insistence upon the basic Socialist principle that no man can put his money to work for him at the expense of others—that is, that no private profit from the work of others in allowed. To this principle the Bolsheviki obstinately returned after their temporary divergence to what was called the New Economic Policy, and there is little doubt that it will continue to hold good in the future. If NEP was thus no more than a brief expedient, why not suppose that the submergence of the idea of world revolution is also no more than temporary, to be revived when occasion offers?

Second, there is the strong and fervent Bolshevist belief that the national rivalries provoked by the innate contradictions of capitalism must inevitably lead to wars. No one today, whether Bolshevik or not can deny that the danger of war has rarely been greater or more imminent, or that, should war come, it might readily be followed by a collapse of the existing systems of government in many European countries.

With these views firmly anchored in the minds of the Bolsheviki, it is not unreasonable to think that they would take steps, or are already taking steps, to prepare for this anticipated collapse by training and organizing foreign Communist parties so that the latter may be able to emulate the Bolshevist example of seizing power at the appropriate moment; or, in other words, to pick up the shattered fragments of society and put them together again in a new Communist frame with the moral and material assistance of the U. S. S. R.

It is here, I believe, that the true importance of the Comintern resides today. If peace can be maintained, the idea of violent revolution will dwindle everywhere, even in Russia itself; but if, on the other hands, the danger of war increases, or war actually begins elsewhere than in Ethiopia, the Comintern will become more and more of a salient factor, not only in Soviet policy but also in world affairs.

1936 Political Campaign In US Well Under Way

Robinsoin Quotes Smith To Show He Once Was New-Deal Backer

The rumble of political cannonading told Americans on January 29 that the campaign of 1936 was well under way.

At the capital the volleys of the Smith-Robinson controversy, and of the Borah speech in New York, continued to roll and thunder. One echo from New York was a flareback from Alfred E. Smith. In the country at large Eugene Talmadge, Governor of Georgia, opened his long awaited anti-Roosevelt "grass roots" conference at Macon. Meanwhile, Gov. Alf M. Landon of Kansas prepared to make a keynote address on the issues of the day before the "Kansas Day" celebration at Topeka, says the Washington correspondent of New York Times in a recent article, which follows:

The Townsend old-age-pension group, meanwhile, denied reports of a change in policy, following Senator Borah's advocacy of a pension of $50 or $60 for all people over 60 but without the Townsend transactions-tax scheme, or the compulsory spending feature.

Townsend Act Threatened

The invocation of the Corrupt Practices Act against the Townsend group in the House, for failure to file expense accounts has been threatened.

On the labor front, political action in the coming campaign was indicated by the continuing session of the United Mine Workers, which yesterday cheered President Roosevelt and booed Mr. Smith, and the declaration before them today by Senator Joseph F. Guffey (D) of Pennsylvania that labor should fight back if the Supreme Court declares his "Little NRA" coal act unconstitutional.

Comments from all sides came on the reply of Senator Joseph T. Robinson (D) of Arkansas to former Gov. Alfred E. Smith of New York, on the radio last night, in which the former quoted "the record" in an effor to show Mr. Smith had changed economic sides since 1932.

Devastating, Democrats Say

Democrats like William Gibbs McAdoo declared the reply "completely devastating"; Senator John H. Bankhead (D) of Alabama said it had "effaced Smith from the political scene," and Representative Maury Maverick (D) of Texas charged it "pinned 'Al' Smith down like a bug in a biology class."

On the other hand, Republicans like Senator Arthur H. Vandenberg of Michigan, and Minority Leader Bertrand H. Snell of New York agreed that it was all "just a family row" of Democrats.

At Cleveland, Col. Frank Knox, Chicago publisher, like Senator Vandenberg and Governor Landon a potential aspirant for the presidential nomination, declared the Administration's reply to Mr. Smith was "pitifully weak" and indicated Roosevelt was "completely on the defensive."

Robinson Cites Record

The past record of Mr. Smith was raked and scored by Senator Robinson to show that the former Democratic presidential candidate had specifically endorsed every one of the new-deal views which he denounced before the American Liberty League dinner here last week.

While Senator Robinson, who was Mr. Smith's running mate in the 1928 national ticket, in a crowded half hour, was branding Mr. Smith by inference as a turncoat, and specifically as the "unhappy warrior," Senator William E. Borah (R) of Idaho in a speech at Brooklyn, N. Y. addressed himself directly to the Republican problem of the presidential convention, in what seemed to many the opening bid for his own nomination. He denounced the Republican "Old Guard," and urged old-age pensions of $50 or $60 for everyone over 60.

Gov. Alf M. Landon of Kansas thought by many to have the edge on all other Republican presidential aspirants at least momentarily, prepared to address a big celebration of Kansas Day at Topeka, in a speech which will cover all the major issues of the day.

At the same time, down in Macon, Ga., 3,000 to 4,000 anti-Roosevelt Democrats, gathered under the banner of Gov. Eugene Talmadge at a "grass roots" conference to chart the course of a revolt from the New Deal.

Opens Senate Floodgate

In the Senate also politics had their day, for Democrats had agreed not to answer the Smith speech until Senator Robinson, the majority leader, had spoken, and their pent-up wrath was glad to find the barrier removed.

Picked out of all the Democrats in the capital to make the official reply to the speech by Mr. Smith, Mr. Robinson crammed the full limit of earlier Smith quotations into the half hour of national radio time allotted to him and attempted at every point to show "by the record" that Mr. Smith had once taken a more extreme stand than the New Deal.

Some of these quotations were effective but Senator Robinson by the exigencies of time was forced to hurry through his address, so that the spoken word was less forceful than the written word, which was the reverse of the case in the Smith speech.

Harps on High Hats

Senator Robinson charged Mr. Smith had "discarded the brown derby for the high hat." Again and again he dwelt on the alleged incongruity of seeing this product of East Side New York in the company of the wealthy American Liberty League, and "men who fought for 25 years against the principles of government you espoused."

In charging that Mr. Smith had deserted his old position, Senator Robinson used the damaging method of citation and quotation which Mr. Smith himself used in charging the New Deal with departure from the 1932 platform. Senator Robinson himself barely mentioned the 1932 platform in his defense although it had made up the core of the Smith speech.

Senator Robinson's one reference to it was to declare that Mr. Smith had not read the whole of the platform and had avoided the section denouncing stock market manipulation—out of deference, as Senator Robinson put it, "to his wealthy friends."

Hoist by His Own Petard

Senator Robinson quoted declarations by former President Hoover in the 1928 campaign denouncing Mr. Smith for alleged Socialism and Communism, in much the same terms with which Mr. Smith himself denounced the New Deal last Saturday night. Senator Robinson recalled that Mr. Smith had sponsored the McNary-Haugen bill, which he termed more radical than the AAA program; and he recalled, too, an unguarded comment by Mr. Smith at the Hotel Astor, New York, Feb. 8, 1933, in which he urged that governmental red tape in the emergency be cut as it had been cut in the World War when, said Mr. Smith, "we took the Constitution, wrapped it up and put it on the shelf and forgot it until it was over."

Republicans in the capital were quick to assert that in meeting Mr. Smith's charge of New Deal inconsistency, with the counter-charge of Smith inconsistency, both sides had proved their case up to the hilt, and that both wings of the Democratic Party were consequently tarred with the same brush.

Senator Robinson, however, in addition to his attack on Mr. Smith gave here and there in his hurried address a defense of Roosevelt which other Administration speakers will go in the campaign ahead.

With these two political broadsides still echoing across the country, two other major developments were under way today in the rapidly moving political scene.

For example, to the Smith charge of huge New Deal extravagances, Senator Robinson retorted that "no President could have refused the call of suffering humanity that existed during the crisis of 1933," and that any President who refused to use the national credit would have been overthrown.

No Excuse to Revolt

Senator Robinson recited, too, figures to show immense business improvement, and in a significant apologia, he added that perhaps President Roosevelt "has employed the wrong tactics—perhaps there has been confusion and loss of energy"; such things occurred, he said "when human beings attempt mass operations in hurried formation under the pressure of adverse fate."

But these things, added Senator Robinson, with a taunt at his old running mate on the Democratic ticket of 1928, "never yet have justified a change of allegiance in the face of the enemy."

Peru Coalition Slates March 19 For Convention

National Front, Composed Of 9 Center Parties, Will Be First To Nominate

The first serious step in preparing the ground for the next Peruvian Presidential election, to elect a successor to General Oscar R. Benavides, was taken in Lima recently with the announcement by the National Front coalition that it will hold a general assembly March 19 to nominate its candidate. The election is scheduled for October.

The Constitutent Assembly, elected in 1931, has continued to be self-perpetuating, functioning with virtually all the powers of a National Congress under the administrations of Sanchez Cerro, who was assassinated, and Benavides, says C. N. Griffiths in the New York Herald Tribune. His article continues:

In the Constituent Assembly ten parties are represented: Nacionalistas, 40; Union Revolucionaria, 25; Liberals, 8; Union Parliamentaria, 21; Social Nacionalistas 5; Socialistas, 4; Apristas, 4; Social Democrats, 1; Democrats, 1, and Independants, 15.

How many parties exist in Peru it would be hard to say but they fall, as in most other countries, into three political groups, Right, Center and Left. The Right is represented principally by the Nacionalista party (the old Civilist party) headed by Clemente Revilla, president of the Constituent Assembly. The Center is composed of nine groups combined as the National Front. Their leader is Amadeo de Pierola, son of Nicolas de Pierola, twice President of Peru (1880-1881 and 1895-1899). The Left is made up of Apristas and Socialistas.

There seems to be a scarcity of Presidential timber of popular appeal. The name of Revilla is suggested as the probable candidate of the Nationalist party, although he said recently that he had no political ambitions. An alternate candidate of the same party may be Jose de la Riva Aguero, who heads the group known as the Accion Patriotica. There also appears to be some favor for General Manuel E. Rodriguez, president of the Council and Minister of Public Works.

A powerful and possibly a decisive element in the elections will be the National Front. In the party there is a strong undercurrent of feeling in favor of Jorge Prado, Peruvian Ambassador to Brazil, who as head of General Benavides's second Cabinet did much to make national reconciliation a reality. But whether he will be willing to run for the National Front is uncertain. Another possible candidate of the same group is Dr. Arturo Osores, who represented the Constitutional party in the 1931 elections.

What part the Left will take in the elections is uncertain. In 1931, Raoul Haya de la Torre, as representative of the Apristas, ran close behind the Civilist candidate, Sanchez Cerro; but today the party is under a ban. It even is possible that under the new electoral law it may not get recognition as a party on the ground that it is a segment of an international organization, the American Pro-Revolutionary Association. There has been no test of Aprista strength at the polls since 1931. The Socialists are strongly represented in Lima and Callao, and presumably will give their votes to any candidate of democratic tendencies.

British Survey Of Coal Will Be Aid To Industry

great resources with which nature has endowed us."

Sir Harold Hartley gave the warning that hopes of sudden expansion of the coal industry must be put aside. Even if Britain's manufactures once again were of prewar type and volume, he said, the production of coal would still remain below its former level.

Greater Efficiency

The reasons the lecturer gave for this fact were that natural science has made coal more efficient. Nearly 15 per cent less coal is required, he stated, to produce a ton of pig iron today than in 1913; fuel economy has been estimated to save the iron and steel industry £4,500,000 each year, the cost of more than 6,000,000 tons of coal; in 1918 3.47 pounds of coal were used to generate a unit of electricity, but now only 1.65 pounds are necessary; the gas industry has increased is output in recent years by 60 per cent, but its consumption of coal has only risen by 10 per cent.

Sir Harold Hartley concluded that the task before mine owners is now to improve methods of distribution and selling.

KYOTO NEWS

Professor P. D. Perkins, of the department of English at the Third Higher School of Kyoto, was the guest speaker at the Kyoto Recreation Club which met Friday evening at the home of Dr. and Mrs. E. S. Cobb. Mr. Perkins spent his hour in recounting some of his experiences as the bibliographer of Lafcadio Hearn. In the beginning, the audience was warned that "Bibliography and biography are not the same. I can't write. But I have found the study of the history of Hearn's writings very interesting". Then he proceeded with a sketch of the writer's life as he had uncovered it during his research.

He was the son of a Greek mother and an Irish father. Her family opposed the marriage and so forced the couple to leave their small island near Greece, and go to Ireland. Finally the mother returned to Greece and the father went to England leaving the young son, who had been named Lafcadio after the small island on which he was born, with his aunt. He finally went off to school in France, where while playing, his eye was lost. "This eye tended to give him an inferiority complex which affected his personality for the remainder of his life. All the portraits of him are either with head bowed so as to conceal the bad eye, or profile," the speaker said.

After returning to England, his aunt did not prove to be such a companionable person so he took a cattle boat to America. The parting, while not a happy one, did not forbid her giving Lafcadio a letter of introduction to a friend in New York. He did not use the letter, nevertheless, but made his way to Cincinnatti, where he finally found work as a printer's devil. Here he developed a friendship with a man named Fitzgerald, an art and literary critic for one of the daily papers. The two of them would spend their free hours visiting curio stores where they purchased all sorts of queer Chinese musical instruments, and which they sought to play.

"He was a figure as he made his way about in that town. Overcoat too large, dumpy in appearance, with a large western hat cocked on his head. The way he secured one of his jobs was interesting. He went in and asked the editor of a certain paper for work. The editor looked at him and said no. Hearn started to leave, but the newspaper man called him and said, 'I will hire you. Take this and see what you can do with it.' What Hearn did with it made journalistic history for that assignment was to the 'Tanyard murder case'".

He once found himself in New Orleans where he took a job helping to compile the Guide Book for the New Orleans Exposition. The work, done by several writers, was hastily put together and so had many errors. Later a new preface was written and new table of contents inserted. This first work of Hearn gave Mr. Perkins a great amount of trouble, for it was difficult to locate a first edition. Over two hundred copies of the work were purchased, but none of them satisfied the repuirements of a theoretical first edition. Finally, the librarian of Oklahoma University notified him that two copies of the guide book were at the University Library. One of them was the much searched for publication.

Likewise, the work "Some Chinese Ghosts" has an interesting history. The editor of Harper's Magazine sent a copy to Dr. Chamberlain of Tokyo. On the strength of this work, Hearn was called to Japan as a teacher. Chamberlain later passed the copy autographed by the editor, to Dr. Dixon, who recently passed it on to Mr. Perkins. "I found that there were two kinds of editions of this work, one bound in yellow and another in red. The former was very rare, which I could not understand until it came to my attention that Hearn was a very erratic person. He wasn't satisfied with the sales on the book, so in a growing fit of anger wrote the editor a series of letters, each one becoming hotter. Finally, in his heat, the editor asked how many copies of the work there were on hand. When the assistant informed him, he gave the order that they should all be burned. Hence the scarcity and consequent high price of this edition."

There have been many good things and bad things said about Hearn. Actually he wrote much bad and much good. Strange to say, some of his best works are not concerned with Japan at all. For instance, his 'Two Years in the French West Indies' and his 'Chita Yuma' are fine prose writings. Americans who have spent a few months in Japan are inclined to say that the Japan of this school teacher has given way to factories. But the Japan of which he wrote is still here, for I have seen it.

An interesting case occurred in connection with the appearance of the "Letters from a Pagan." Zoe Kincaid immediately said the work was a forgery, in her review of the book. How she knew is a mystery, but after a long correspondence, the publisher loaned the manuscripts, letters from Hearn to a second person, and edited by a third person who had purchased and published them, was turned over to the Huntington Library for examination. The paper on which they were all written, though dating over a long period of years, was all from the same package. Finally it was found that there were pencil marks beneath the purple ink. Hence the forged nature of the letters was proved. Unfortunately, the son has recently issued a translation of these letters.

"The life of a bibliographer is not as dry as dust, but is fascinating. We uncover many secrets," the speaker said.

Rio de Janeiro Storm Hits Only Half Of City

The city of Rio de Janeiro, Brazil, witnessed on February 6 the meterological phenomenon of eight hours of a heavy, steady rainfall in the southern part of the city. Traffic was paralyzed. Automobiles were unable to negotiate most of the streets. In many cases the water went over the side-walks, flooding cellars.

In the northern section of the city the rainfall was slight and did not start until several hours after the storm in the southern part, according to the New York Times. The rainfall broke the intense heat wave which had lasted for several days.

British Arms Man Admits 'Greasing'

People Won't 'Do Anything For Nothing,' Soley Head Tells Royal Commission

The custom of "greasing the wheels" in the munitions business was discussed for the first time on February 6 in London before the dignified Royal Commission which is inquiring into the private armaments industry in Great Britain.

The witness was Captain John Ball, director of the Soley Armaments Company, Ltd., who, according to Ferdinand Kuhn, Jr. in the New York Times, had boasted in a letter read at the Washington munitions inquiry that his firm could sell enough surplus rifles from the stocks of the British War Office "to alter the political balance of power of smaller States." The article from London dated Feb. 6, continues:

"Whatever other firms have told us, it seems that 'palm greasing' is something you recognized," remarked Sir Thomas Allen, a member of the committee.

"Oh, most certainly," replied Captain Ball, who has had especially large dealings with South American republics. "People are not going to do anything for nothing."

"Do you say, then, that in dealing with all your customers it is necessary to grease the wheels?" asked J. A. Spender, historian and editor, another member of the commission.

"No, I don't by any means," Captain Ball answered. "With some of them it is essential; with others it isn't."

Matter of "Longitude, Latitude"

"There is a sort of moral meridian?" he was asked.

"It is a matter of longitude and latitude," was the reply.

The captain was easily the most rugnacious of the armament dealers who have been questioned by the commission so far. Short and thick-set, with supreme self-confidence, he answered every question as if he took pride in his work and did not mind if the commission knew it.

He smiled when the chairman of the commission, Sir John Eldon Bankes, read a letter written by Captain Ball, stating that a section of the press had suggested that his firm was "as devoid of morals as an Italian organ grinder's monkey."

He listened attentively while Dame Rachel Crowdy, another member of the commission, read a letter from Captain Ball to the American Armament Corporation of New York. This letter, which had already been read before the Nye committee in Washington, suggested that China needed small arms, that Japan's inroads "would seriously affect United States interests in China," and that American interests might be willing to buy arms from Captain Ball's company with which to support the Chinese.

Hint to Americans Scored

"If you wanted to get rid of these rifles, why didn't you do so direct?" asked Dame Rachel.

"Because the Chinese Government hadn't the money to pay for them," Captain Ball snapped back.

"It was better for the United States to stand the loss of it?"

"Why not? We weren't going to do it," was the reply.

"You were definitely putting into the minds of the Americans that they had better buy arms in order to support the Chinese," Dame Rachel persisted. "That seems to me to come very much within the category of preparation."

"I should call it intelligent anticipation on my part," said the witness.

Captain Ball complained of government embargoes on the export of arms in China, in the Chaco war and now in the Italo-Ethiopian conflict and said they had cost the British taxpayer "very nearly £2,000,000 in the past seven or eight years."

"The British Government has refused to allow the export of British rifles to Ethiopia," he explained, "that is, government-owned arms from surplus stocks. But stocks of British rifles and British guns were left in various countries after the war—Italy, for instance. There's nothing to prevent these British rifles from being used in Ethiopia at the present moment."

Only Letter of Law

This angered Dame Rachel, who remarked:

"The only thing the British Government is concerned with is the letter of the law," Captain Ball retorted. "The government cannot prevent shipmet of British rifles from other countries. How can it prevent that?"

"I am glad to say it is not the only thing with which the British people are concerned," Dame Rachel shot back, "but I don't propose to enter into an argument on that."

Sir Philip Gibbs, another member of the commission, then asked Captain Ball if permission had ever been refused him to export arms.

"It is no good for me to offend any government department," the witness replies. "I live here and can't be at loggerheads with the British Government, or what's going to happen to me?"

He admitted, however, that "quite a number" of his applications for licenses had been refused by the government, but said he could not imagine why.

No Links With U.S. Firms

Captain Ball said his firm no longer had any relations with American companies but had an agent in Liege and another in Berlin at present. The company's continental business, compared with British, was in proportion of "a thousand to one," he declared.

Sir Philip promptly asked how the Soley Company got its stocks of rifles and other munitions of war.

"We get our stocks from the surplus of foreign governments," said Captain Ball.

"A majority of these governments are willing to sell them to any one who hands over the money?" the questioner continued. "If you get an offer from any one country in the world, you can obtain stocks on the Continent?"

"Yes," replied the witness.

"You get them from governments or middlemen?"

"From middlemen," was the answer.

"Some of these middlemen hold stocks on behalf of their governments and you find it rather easy to get rifles if an order comes through?" Sir Philip persisted.

"If the money comes through," Captain Ball said.

He added that the United States also engaged in the second-hand arms trade and had a larger surplus than Britain, but "there's not very fierce competition in this trade."

Earlier in the day the commission listened to spokesmen of five other companies, each solemnly protesting that there was nothing sinister in his firm's munitions or armaments business.

Fears "Loss to Country"

Sir Harry McGrown, chairman of Imperial Chemical Industries, Ltd. asserted that he opposed nationalization of the armaments industry not because of the loss it would cause his company but solely because of "the great loss to the country."

John Rogers, director of the same company, expressed a belief that "men engaged in private trade are not guided by the profit motive."

Sir Harry admitted that the entry of Germany into the market had intensified competition in the sale of explosives. His own company was not making poison gases at present or even engaged in research upon them, he said, although in an emergency it would try to fill the government's requirements.

Geoffrey Burton, managing director of the Birmingham Small Arms Company, Ltd., charged that the small arms industry of Britain had been "crippled" by lack of government support. Its development in this country had dropped behind that of others to such an extent, he said, that "foreign guns and foreign designs have had to be purchased."

He complained that the Colt factory in the United States and the Bren Works in Czechoslovakia had been busy for several years while his own arms works "stood practically idle" and his company had been forced to make bicycles and automobile parts instead of guns.

When the commission resumes its hearings tomorrow Captain Ball will complete his testimony.

Assessment On Empire State Building Reduced

the Empire State Building as the most highly assessed skyscraper in the city, continued to hold first place this year with the same assessment of $29,000,000.

One of the skyscrapers with a higher assessed valuation is the seventy-story RCA Building, in Rockefeller Center, with an assessment of $26,500,000, an increase of $500,000 over 1935. The Sunken Plaza is appraised by the city's tax assessors at $2,500,000.

Another with a higher assessment this year is the Standard Oil Building, 26 Broadway. Its assessed value is $11,400,000, an increase of $250,000.

Unchanged Assessments Listed

Among the better-known structures on which assessments are the same as last year are the following:

Bankers Trust	$20,350,000
Stock Exchange	19,500,000
1 Wall Street	19,500,000
Equitable Trust	15,850,000
Chrysler Building	15,200,000
Hotel New Yorker	10,800,000
500 Fifth Avenue	8,000,000
First National Bank	6,500,000
J. P. Morgan Building	6,200,000

Mr. Miller said he and his fellow tax commissioners have been holding day and night hearings for more than a month and that the entire office staff worked until half an hour after midnight on Friday listening to representatives of properties seeking reductions from the tentative assessments fixed last October.

In all cases where reductions were granted, as in the case of the Empire State Building, stipulations were entered into forestalling the application for court reviews on the reduced assessment.

The Female Freemason

Elizabeth Aldworth, (died 1773) daughter of Arthur St. Leger, Lord Doneraile of Ireland, is the only woman admitted into the fraternity of the Masonic order. When a young girl, she concealed herself in a large grandfather's clock during an initiation meeting. Her presence became known when the clock stopped, and one of the members opened the door to examine the machinery. The girl was sentenced to die, but one of the members, falling in love with her beauty, saved her by proposing that she take the oath and be admitted as a member of the order. She is the only Freemason of the feminine sex, and later married her saviour, Richard Aldworth of Newmarket, near Cork.

Electric 'Starter' For Heart Shown

Doctors View New Device Like Flashlight That Is Used To Revive Stilled Beats

A new type of "starter" for a heart that has stopped beating, which has already "resurrected" the still hearts of two human beings who could not have been resuscitated by other available methods, was shown recently before a group of physicians at Naval Headquarters, Christopher and Washington Streets, New York City, according to the New York Times.

The new apparatus was developed during the last year under the auspices of the Witkin Foundation for the Study and Prevention of Heart Disease, at Beth David Hospital, by Dr. Albert S. Hyman, director of the foundation.

Dr. Hyman, who holds the rank of lieutenant commander in the United States Naval Reserve Corps, described the latest model of his "heart-starter" during the sixth annual Carolina Greenwood Lecture on Resuscitation before a meeting of the Section on Aviation Medicine, Medical Corps, United States Naval Reserves, Third District.

Weighs Less Than a Pound

The new artificial heart-pacer is the size of a pocket flashlight, only ten inches long and weighing less than a pound. It is based, Dr. Hyman told the physicians, on new knowledge recently discovered at Beth David Hospital about the type of electric current and the amount necessary to make a still heart resume its life-beats.

The heart has a natural pacemaker in the right auricle, consisting of a group of cells that develop an electric current of about one-thousandth of a volt. This current from the auricle spreads through the heart and causes the heart muscle to contract periodically.

The artificial pacemaker consists of a gold-plated needle that is inserted in the exact spot of the natural pacemaker and supplies the heart artificially with the same amount of current when, for some cause or other, the natural pacemaker has failed to develop the electric current. Such causes may be electric shock or sudden stoppage of the heart in cases of angina pectoris or certain types of coronary thrombosis.

After a certain period, under normal conditions, the natural pacemaker may resume its action and life goes on as before, provided the resuscitator had been applied no later than from eight to twelve minutes.

Simpler in Construction

The new heart-starter, while based on the same general principles as the earlier artificial pacemakers developed by Dr. Hyman during the last five years, is not only much simpler in construction but supplies different types and quantities of electric current. As a result it is expected to save lives that would not have responded to the use of the earlier models of the apparatus.

"It has been discovered during the past year," Dr. Hyman said, "that the currents which had been used, while exactly similar to the currents generated by the natural pacemaker, were not effective in certain types of the dying heart, and it was found experimentally that another from of electric current would stimulate the heart better and more completely."

Since the natural pacemaker generates a current of about one-thousandth of a volt, it had been assumed that the artificial apparatus should duplicate that amount of voltage. It was found, however, that the reason certain dying hearts failed to respond to the artificial current was because the current was not strong enough in those particular cases, as some hearts require more than one-thousandth of a volt.

This new knowledge led to the development of the flashlight pacemaker. Whereas the original apparatus released one-thousandth of a volt in the stopped heart, at the end of the needle for a period of one-tenth of a second, the "life flashlight" produces one-fifth of a volt, or 200 millivolts, for only one-sixtieth of a second, in cycles of six—that is, six impulses of one-fifth of a volt each are released into the dying heart at intervals of one-sixtieth of a second.

The new apparatus, Dr. Hyman said, has so far been applied to seven cases with good results in two.

wholly owned subsidiaries in 1935, making 41,000 at the year-end, not including 5,000 employed in controlled companies. Upward, adjustments in hourly wage rates were made at all oerating points where conditions warranted such changes.

Total payroll for 1935 was $63,150,000 for the company and subsidiaries, an increase of $5,290,000, or 9.33 per cent, over 1934. The pension trust fund had $19,685,952 on Dec. 31. The report says that the effect of the Social Security Act on the pension plan has not been fully determined, and unless held unconstitutional or amended, important changes adverse to the interest of employes may be necessary owing to the additional financial burden imposed by the act.

Taxes Set at $10,000,000

In 1935 the company paid or accrued about forty different kinds of taxes which approximated $10,000,000, or about 90 cents a share on the outstanding common stock. Pierre S. du Pont, chairman, and Lammot du Pont, president, reported.

"If the spending programs of our governmental bodies continue at the present unprecedented levels, they will, in turn, require, to avoid fiscal bankruptcy, the assessment and collection of progressively increasing taxes from every one including your company and its stockholders," the report reads in part.

"If additional taxes are imposed to enable the government to launch enterprises sheltered from bankruptcy of funds from the Federal Treasury in competition with existing or projected private undertakings, such government projects must certainly arrest the return of that enterprise and initiative to which both the government and the people have been looking to employ those unfortunate unemployed people who must always be the victims of taxes, if excessive.

"It is doubly unfortunate that in levying new taxes in these times out authorities have endeavored by those very taxes to effect and precipitate revolutionary changes in many of our ideals, institutions and customs, honored by year sof usage and respect. . . ."

The number of stockholders on Dec. 31 was 52,831 common and 13,267 debenture stockholders, against 51,864 and 13,410 respectively, the year before.

The salary of the president in 1935 was $100,000, the same as in 1934. This officer does not participate in any bonus. Honolulu Couple Give ¥70,000 For New Work at Doshisha "U"

Mr. and Mrs. Theodore Richards of Honolulu have given ¥70,000 for the establishment of the Friend Peace Center at Doshisha university, Kyoto, according to announcement made at Doshisha today.

The gift was made in connection with the recent 60th anniversary which was celebrated at the institution. For many years, students from Honolulu have come to Doshisha to study, under the auspices of the Friend Peace Scholarship of Honolulu. The proposed center will house these students in the future.

An extensive piece of property, known as the Nashinoki estate, near the Kyoto Imperial Palace grounds and Doshisha University and comprising an area of more than 21,000 square feet and including a large building, has been purchased by the Richards.

To carry out the plans for the new center, the Richards will have the house remodelled. Arrangements will be made to provide ample accommodations for social, religious, and international program in addition to a student dormitory.

It is expected that the Friend Peace Scholarship Fellows, who are sent from Hawaii to Doshisha to study Japanese language and culture, and at the same time to perform Christian and academic service to the institution, are to take leading roles in making this international house a typical "Hawaii Christian Center" in Japan.

To assist with the remodelling of this house and also to help commemorate the twenty-fifth anniversary of the founding of the Friend Peace Scholarship, which includes the publication of the anniversary number of the "Friend", Mr Colbert Naoya Kurokawa, a member of the Scholarship Committee, arrived at Yokohama on February 21st, on the Asama Maru of N.Y.K. Line.

It was over twenty-five years ago that Mr. Theodore Richards of Honolulu conceived the idea of providing means of educating to outstanding Japanese students in Hawaii and the United States. This resulted in the establishment of the Friend Peace Scholarship in 1911. The first group of Scholarship Fellows arrived in Honolulu and matriculated at the present Mid-Pacific Institute, formerly called Mills School. Dr. Iwao Ayusawa, now the Director of the International Labor Office of Tokyo, was included in this first group.

Among the prominent sponsors and patrons of the original plan the following were included: the late Dr. Inazo Nitobe, Honorable Yukio Ozaki, the then Mayor of Tokyo, the late Marquis Shigenobu Okuma, the late Honorable Saburo Shimada, the late President Jinzo Naruse of the Nihon Woman's College, Dr. Danjo Ebina, former President of Doshisha University, the late Baron Ichizaemon Morimura, and others.

In 1922 changes were made. Instead of granting the scholarship to students from Japan, they were awarded to American citizens of Oriental ancestry born in Hawaii to enable them to study at the University of Hawaii and universities in the United States.

To provide opportunities for the education in Japan of the American citizens of Japanese ancestry, another departure was made in the plan in 1927; this time sending them to Doshisha University to study language and culture of Japan, and at the same time teach English. This is the plan operating at present. The Fellows are also sent from Hawaii to Yenching University, Peiping, China.

Today there are nearly fifty men and women who have been awarded these scholarships. On the occasion of the twnty-fifth anniversary celebration, reunions are being planned in Hawaii, Japan, and China.

It is hoped by the donors and sponsors that with the establishment of this "center" an important contribution will be made in American-Japan relations.

Morgan Leaves Happy, 'Cleared' By Friend Nye

J. P. Morgan, his big briar smoking like a small locomotive, and his face beaming good nature, "walked out" on the Senate munitions inquiry in Washington, D. C., on Feb. 5 by agreement.

"I have had a fine time; I would not have missed this investigation for the world," he told Senator Nye, the chairman, as he shook hands just before leaving to go home.

Mr. Morgan left knowing that he had won the friendship of every member of the committee, says the New York Times. Mr. Nye and his committee colleagues joined in saying that nothing to the discredit of Mr. Morgan or his banking house had been developed in the more than two weeks of investigation of the wartime operations of the house.

Thomas W. Lamont, George Whitney and Russell C. Leffingwell, other members of the firm questioned, left for New York later.

Just Seven Over Again

A school examiner asked a little boy how many days there are in a year. After receiving seven as the answer, he remarked: "I said a year, not a week. Now, try again."

The boy appeared nonplussed for a minute, and then replied: "Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday, Friday, Saturday and Sunday, and if there are any more I've not heard of them."—El Paso World News.

Australia Carried To New Prosperity With Wool Up

Last Holiday Day Trade Was Greater Than Any Since 1928

Wool has carred Australia to a new and buoyant prosperity, culminating in a holiday trade greater than any since 1928, and in new year prospects that are brighter, perhaps, than any yet known. The old saying that Australia lives on the sheep's back is as true today as it was before the rise of her other great agricultural industries and her considerable manufacturing industries, according to the Sydney correspondent of the Christian Science Monitor.

"Wool is up!" "Wool is down!" Either of these announcements has repercussions throughout Australia. "Wool up" means more money for the pastoralist, for the commercial, manufacturing and business men, for everybody. "Wool down"—and everyone feels it adversely.

The importance of the wool industry to the nation was never so apparent as in the harder days that have not long goneby. The general improvement of the condition of industry and commerce in Australia was correlative to the emergence of the wool trade from the slough of loy prices and poor demand. Today the industry is profitable.

Firm Market Shown

Some variations in wool prices may be seen during the remainder of the current selling season, but indications are undoubtedly favorable for continued ready sale of the 1935-36 clip has been sold at prices which, on an average, are about 5d a lb. more than the 1934-35 average. The latter represented a heavy fall from the 1933-34 average, which was an artificial level.

Prices collapsed during the last three months of that season and did not recover until the last three months of last season, recovery continuing progressively into the current season. Whereas demand was hesitant for most of last season, and the market always on the verge of uncertainty, risk confidence has marked buying operations this season. The market, rising from 25 to 40 per cent at the opening, has firmed still more as the sales in the nine or ten selling centers in Australia have progressed.

Heavy Demand Indicated

Unless some unexpected circumstance arises, a ready demand appears assured for the balance of this year's supplies. In Great Britain, the United States, Japan, France and Belgium, an improved consumption of the raw material has been experienced. The general nature of the improvement is encouraging. In volume of consumption of wool, at the mills, Britain, the United States, and Japan have displayed the greatest expansion. The wool trade certainly appears to have better days ahead than those experienced in most years since 1930.

It is a coincidence that owing to seasonal disabilities the quantity of the staple grown will be less in Australia, the United States and Argentina. The amount of merino wool available in the world shows a decrease, just when the consumption is at its briskest.

The reduction will be offset somewhat by the substitution of crossbreds, but the statistical situation of the raw material is likely to prove strong enough to keep demand for wool keen.

Higher Purchasing Power

Influences apart from the supply position, have contributed to the better market and have assisted in establishing the greater public purchasing power necessary to keep a measure of pace with the higher cost of wool. Conservative optimism regarding prices in 1936 is, therefore, considered justified here. have assisted materially in providing the competition which has produced high prices for spinners' fleeces showing an attractive depth of staple.

One Sydney wool house remarks: "The mills have been actively employed in the United States, consumption of the staple being the largest experienced for some years. The briskness of turnover there has not been a 'flash in the pan.' It has been supported by sales right through to the retail trade.

Big Sales to America

"The motorcar industry has also been busy, and has used large quantities of wool for upholstery purposes. The greater consumption in the United States has coincided with a reduced clip there, due to adverse seasonal conditions. Recovery will in time be seen, but meanwhile America will find it necessary to import more extensively than for some years, particularly if mill turnover is maintained as expected."

Actually in the five months of the selling season to November 30 (the latest date for which statistics are available) exports to the United States, at 14,924 bales, showed an increase of 14,194 bales on exports during the corresponding period of 1934. The 1935 total placed the United States eighth on the list of buyers of Australian wool; last year she was fourteenth.

Sanctions have had an effect, but one scarcely worthy of account. Italy during the five months to Nov. 30 bought only 6,528 bales of wool, compared with 23,521 bales in the corresponding period of 1934. But the latter total itself represented a tremendous decrease on the 1933 figure, due to Italy's import restrictions. Her restrictions and Germany's embargo were mainly responsible for the collapse of prices in the 1934-35 season. The market, having suffered and recovered from those blows, has scarcely felt the effect of Italy's further decreased purchases this year.

Japan Sets Pace

Japan's purchases were the dominating factor in the 1934 jump in prices. Right from the start of this selling season, she bid actively for Australian wool, setting a pace for all other consumer countries to follow. The total of 266,913 bales exported to Japan during the five months to Nov. 30 was 107,925 bales more than the 1934 exports.

A high Japanese wool-buying authority said before the season opened that Japan would buy 800,000 bales this year, but as the most she can expect to buy in Australia this year is 400,000 bales, it seems that she will go into the next selling season "hungry" for wool.

Other Increases

Increases in exports were also displayed to France, 37,068 bales; Britain, 20,833; Belgium, 18,613; Czechoslovakia, 10,747; Netherlands, 10,585; Poland, 9,442; Germany, 5,571; Austria, 2954, and Canada, 2049. Britain took the greatest quantity—395,338 bales—but as much of this is taken to London for sale there for re-export to European countries, while Japan's purchases are all for use in her on mills, it is probable that Japan is close upon Britain's heels as an actual consumer of Australian wool.

A careful examination of the figures furnished from various selling centers has confirmed the estimate of 2,930,000 bales for the current season. Of that total 2,665,000 bales will pass throught brokers' stores in Australia for disposal. Allowing for the carryover from the 1934-35 season, the total quantity of wool for sale in Australia this season will be 2,755,747 bales, or 365,000 bales less than in the previous year.

1,400,000 Bales Sold

About 1,400,000 bales have already been sold, and it is expected that the remainder will be sold by early April. A point of interest also is that the average weight per bale of greasy wool sold in Australia this season has been about nine pounds lighter than during the previous season. Consequently the decrease in the clip is even greater than is apparent from a comparison of bales.

Pastoral conditions in New South Wales and Queensland, where two thirds of the Australian clip are grown, do not indicate that an appreciable increase in production will occur next season. There have been dry to droughty conditions in many parts of these two states, and wool-growing conditions have not been favorable. The lambing was generally light. The number of stock available for shearing is consequently not likely to increase, and may be less.

Love's Greatest Sacrifice

When Sincclath Soonchet Singh of Kashmir died in 1843, 525 of his young wives committed suicide by voluntarily walking into his funeral pyre to be immolated with him. This mass suicide (suttee) took place at Ramnagar, India.

Before the British conquered India, sutte was obligatory upon every wife surving her husband. The widow was usually placed in a sort of decorated outhouse until the day of the funeral. When the dead husband was about to be burned, the widow took tearful leave of her relatives, and in the expectation of endless bliss in after life, would voluntarily mount the funeral pyre, to be reduced to ashes within a short time. The English prohibited this custom, but the mass suicide caused by Sincclath, one of the largest in history, was perfectly voluntary.

Sculptor Turns Bartender, Declares No Profit In Art

The depression naturally has changed the course of many careers, but when one turns from sculpture in wood to bartending, as Frank Reele was forced to do, it presents a unique situation.

Mrs. Reale, who is 49 years old, has displayed his works at the National Academy of Art, the Montclair Museum, Radio City and the Brooklyn Museum, which recently purchased two of his pieces, works of Bacchus and Ariadne, says the New York Times. They were on deeply in the water-color section on the fifth floor of the Brooklyn institution recently.

Between the becks and calls of thirsty patrons at the Plymouth Bar, Clark and Henry Streets, Brooklyn, where he has been employed a little over a year, the genial, gray-haired artist found time to talk about his two divergent occupations.

Explaining that it takes from two to three months to turn out one piece of woodwork in the fine arts category, Mr. Reale said that $500, the price he ordinarily received in the pre-depression era, was necessary to realize a fair profit.

"When people pay you $5 and $10 for the same thing," he sighed, "what can a man do? You've got to live."

The final act which led him to drop his life work for his present position, Mr. Reale said, came in the beginning of 1934 at the Montclair Museum exhibition.

"A millionaire bought a piece I displayed at that exhibition," he declared somewhat disconsolately. "It was an elaborately carved bookcover. You know what he paid for it? Twenty-five dollars. I had it listed for $300, but that's what he paid for it—$25."

Aga Khan Has Ruled Moslems For 50 Years

If you go to Tashkent, Bokhara, or Samarkand you will find his followers. You will find them also without much difficulty even in Sunni Afghanistan. You will find them easily in Bombay and Karachi and Kenya, Uganda, and Zanzibar. But you will not readily find them in Persia itself. For Persia is a homogeneous Shia country, and though the Ismailites are there in quantity they are concealed. There are historical reasons why it is wiser for them to conform outwardly.

In the nineteenth century de Gobineau spent two terms in Persia at the French Legation, ending up as French Minister in Teheran. He wrote two books, "Trois Ans en Asie" and "Religions et Philosophies de l'Asie Centrale," which to me have always seemed the classic foundation for the study of modern Persia. I have, alas! neither of them by me now, but they show that de Gobineau, whose own interest in the religions of Persia proved a passport, had obtained contact with the Ismailites of his day. In Iran I have had confirmation of the fact that they are numerous today, though I have had no outward evidence.

In Iran, where the philosophy of Omar Khayyam is common, scepticism and mysticism go hand in hand. According to Gobineau the Persian Zoroastrians who were converted to Islam remained in essence what they were before. Certainly they made of Islam something different from what it meant to the Turk and the Arab. These, too, had their bektashis and other esoteric dervishes, but in the main the Islam of the Sunnis was a simpler, more external religion than that of the Persian Shias, where the educated classes either intoxicated themselves with mystical poetry or with daring speculation.

Linked to Royalty

Through the Aga Khans' family the Ismailites linked themselves not merely with the Prophet, but with the royal house of Persia in Zoroastrian times. The Ismailites were an esoteric sect believed to preserve the essence of the old religion under the form of the new. They were also called the Batinites (Internalists), because they taught that everything in the Koran had an internal or allegoric and hidden meaning. They were given a sudden rise to notoriety in the eleventh century by Hassan Sabbah, who within the sect formed the society of the Assassins—so called from their use of hashish as a dope for fedai, the devotees who performed assassinations.

Hassan Sabbah captured the mountain fortress of Alamut, which is where the present Shah of Persia comes from, became known as the Sheikh-el-Jebel, le roi des montagnes, and passed into English as "the Old Man of the Mountains." The Assassins mastered Persia, and made their power felt in Syria, where Europe met them in the Crusades. On the 17th day of Ramazan in 1164 another Hassan, the ruler of the day disclosed to the assembled people the secret doctrine, and declared the external doctrine of Islam abolished.

Shortly afterwards he announced that he was the promised Imam, and a lineal descendant of Ismail. The rule of the Assassins was finally ended by the Tartar Hulaku in 1256, when 12,000 of them were massacred.

Indian Converts

But the tenets of the Ismailites, as distinguished from the Assassins, continued to flourish in secret. In Syria they were preserved by the Druses, and from Persia they were carried North and East to the Khanates, into Afghanistan, and down to India. In India they made converts from Hindulsm, and the sect became known as Khojas. These have been a feature of the Bombay presidency for four hundred years. Like the Parsees, who came from Persia earlier still, they display great aptitude for commerce, and they form a small but wealthy community, which has established important outposts across the water in Africa.

The Aga Khan's family was too powerful and too virile to disappear in Persia. They intermarried with the Kajar dynasty in its early days, but the great grandfather of the present Aga Khan was murdered at Yezd in Fath Ali Shah's time. His son, the first to bear the title Aga Khan, and the present holder's grandfather, became Governor-General of Kernan, but was compelled to fly from Persia. Of his subsequent career and his great friendship, through Napier, with the English, there is no need here to speak. But he gave to the faith of the Ismailites a tremendous impetus, particularly in Sind, which endures to this day.

USUtilities Warned As Inquiry Is Ended

Stop 'Unfair Practices' Or Face Extinction, Mack Tells Stockholders

John E. Mack, counsel to the legislative committee investigating the American public utilities in Albany, N. Y., warned the utility companies recently to eliminate "unfair practices" and reduce rates, or face the threat of extinction through the rise of public ownership.

The stockholders of these concerns must realize, he said, that if they are to be protected in their investments their employees' (officials of the operating companies) must understand that they are trustees not only for the stockholders, but for the consumers.

Officers, he went on, should be as alive to getting a fair rate for consumers as they are to getting a fair return to stockholders, according to the New York Times. Mr. Mack cited an Ohio case where the "employes" disregarded the rights of consumers and, as a result, a municipal plant wiped out the operating company.

The work of the committee was praised by Mr. Mack.

The committee was to submit a report proposing various legislative changes.

Committee Spent $500,000

Originally set up in 1934 after the revelations which let to the ousting of Senator Warren Thayer, Republican whip because of his relationship with the Associated Gas and Electric Company, the committee, according to its counsel, found no further evidence of improper connections between the legislators and the utilities.

The committee has spent $500,000 and has been criticized for expending so much money and presenting what some persons have called meagre returns.

Although there is strong sentiment among some members to recommend for another appropriation to continue the work, it is understood that the body will not pass out of existence.

Governor Lehman of New York State is known to be opposed to any further appropriation for continuing the inquiry.

The final report of the committee will be awaited with considerable interest on Capitol Hill in view of the sharp contest between the committee members and Governor Lehman at the close of the last legislative session over the work of the body. At that time John J. Dunnigan, Democratic Senate leader, attempted to force through a second appropriation of $500,000 for the body which got $250,000 for its first year of work.

Minority Report Possible

The Governor, scarcely concealing his dissatisfaction with the committee's activities and particularly its failure to devote more time to the primary purpose for which the body was created, namely the relations between legislators and public officials and the utility companies, balked at the Dunnigan demand.

Eventually a $300,000 additional appropriation was forced through, but Mr. Lehman made it plain that he expected a final report from the inquiry committee this year.

Even within the committee there is a small minority which takes the same stand as Governor Lehman. Some members are known to feel that the committee failed to press its inquiry with anything like thoroughness. Three members are said to be considering submission of a minority report.

In his statement today Judge Mack said:

"The first matter we addressed ourselves to—the connection between ultilities and public officials—would have been found had it existed among the files of the various corporations.

"While time and money precided our examination of all the companies in the State, a careful examination of all the books and files and a perusal of the returns, under oath, of the questionnairs (sent to members of the Legislature and, I believe, the committee there is no improper connection between members of the Legislature and State officials generally and the utilities.

$15,000,000 Rate Cut Cited

"Our examination as to the conduct of the holding and operating companies indicates there is an opportunity for tremendous improvement in their acts and conduct.

"The stockholders of these companies must realize that if they are to be protected in their investments, their employes—the officials of the operating companies—must realize they are the trustees not only for the stockholders but also for the consumers, because the consumers' money pays the entire cost.

"The officers of the operating companies should be just as alive to securing a fair rate to the consumers as they are in a fair return to the investing stockholders.

"In Ohio where the employes disregarded the rights of the consumers, a municipal plant has entirely wiped out the operating company so that its physical property is now worth nothing, but just junk value.

"I am sure that the work of this committee in throwing light on unfair practices of some of the operating companies will bring about the elimination of many unfair practices and a fair reduction of rates.

Knox Denounces New Deal 'Waste'

know we were in a depression until six months of a year after it really started our way.

"The recovery forces were already at work when the New Dealers came into office and the President, when he announced his intention of cutting costs in government, gave them a tremendous impetus. It was an impetus which was slowed down when he changed his program and began spending in every direction. It was not until the volding of the NRA by the Supreme Court that business began moving forward again.

Calls for Cooperation

"We are all wage earners and workers together. Because we are all wage earners, we who do the selecting and those whom we select should work together. In that way, and in that way only, can we continue our march toward real prosperity.

"But we cannot continue that march if we allow those whom we elect to public office to drive a wedge between us by preaching a doctrine of class hatred. There are no classes in this country. The millhand of today is the employer of tomorrow. That is the American system. In that system, and that system only, lies hope for all.

"If the New Dealers can prove, in the open forum, that it is for the best interest of the people that business should be under government ownership, then by all means let us have it. But in stating their case in this same open forum, let them not fail to tell what has happened to the wage-earner and the farmer in Italy and in Russia, two nations where business is under the ownership and control of government.

"Let them tell how living costs have gone up in those countries, how wages have gone down, how the worker surrenders more than 30 per cent of his wages to the tax collector, how he is compelled to stay in the job selected for him, how he is denied the right of strike. Let all these things be told.

"And, if they New Dealers cannot prove their case against the American system of free enterprise, then let them cease their attacks against it.

"We are one people. Let us continue to live that way.

"And may we always remember that if we lose sight of our neighbor's rights, soon we shall lose sight of our own.

"If we allow our neighbor's property to be seized, our own property will be seized soon afterward."

Earlier in his speech, Colonel Knox quoted President Roosevelt's plea for economy in his message to Congress on March 10, 1933, when the President pointed out that a deficit of $5,000,000,000 existed and declared that the government must avoid the danger of a loose fiscal policy.

"The President's own figures today show deficits for 1934-35 and '36 of $10,798,000,000" Colonel Knox said. "And to that the deficit of the 1937 budget, the budget the administration is now struggling with. Without any question the deficits in the 1937 budget will total $4,000,000,000.

"That means that under the New Deal administration we will have accumulated deficits of their making of more than $14,500,000,000."

Lady Astor Urges Women Veto War

Talking Over Radio To Chicago Congress, She Asks Anglo-American Drive

A radio address from England by Lady Astor and a program covering a wide range of subjects in social welfare, education and peace marked the opening on February 13 of the Third Annual Women's Congress at Chicago.

Seven thousand women, many from far away States attended the two-day, convention, which was held under the sponsorship of The Chicago Tribune.

Lady Astor was heard over a short-wave broadcast, speaking from an ante-room of the Parliament House in London, of which she is a member. She greeted the members of the congress as the "new pioneers."

The question of peace and war, she said, is the greatest question in the world today, and in determining it rightly the women must take the lead, according to the New York Times, whose account follows:

"Why is war the greatest question?" Lady Astor asked. "There are two reasons, I think. The first is because in the future it will involve the wholesale slaughter from the air of women as well as men. Women are the social guardians of the human race. We bring children into the world, as we all know, and we feel war more deeply about war than men do or ever could.

Difficult to Escape Effects

"Now, the second reason why war is the greatest question is that because it is increasingly difficult for any one nation to insulate itself from the effect of war. Some nations may be able to keep out of the fighting line for a little while.

"The United States are not unnaturally trying to do this, and I don't blame them. But no nation can insulate itself from the mental and economic effects of a general war.

"Also, in the long run, as in the last war, no great and leading nation can keep out; nor is any nation ever a victor in the modern war.

"The only certain way to end war is to see that it never begins. And that is where women come in!

"Certainly I believe that the leadership in this great task of war and peace has got to be taken by the two great English-speaking democracies—the United States and Great Britain, in both of which the women have a great say.

"We women must go ahead of the politicians and build for generations unborn."

During the day the women heard of Stoneleigh College, Rye, N. H., former president of the General Federation of Women's Clubs; Mrs. Benjamin F. Langworthy, president of the National Congress of Parents and Teachers, and other speakers including Colonel Robert R. McCormick, editor of The Tribune, and Dr. Glenn Frank, president of the University of Illinois.

In the evening the women heard a discussion of the problems of government by Senator Alben W. Barkley of Kentucky, Mrs. George B. Simmons, Missouri farm woman who has been critical of the New Deal; Justice George W. Maxey of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, and Miss Charl Williams, president of the National Federation of Business and Professional Women's Clubs.

Miss Ruth De Young, woman's editor of The Tribune and organizer of the congress, presided.

Mrs. Poole held that "world progress is not all on the credit side." One of the "tragic losses of modern life," she said, was the "bad habit of wanting all we see."

She thought that "we have also lost a sense of national and social security," and that "children are not fitted for the life they must enter upon leaving school."

"All of these things," she concluded "represented a challenge to all of us, not to women alone, not to middle are alone, or to youth alone. There are three things which, if they were practiced, would take progress. These are that the spirit of God reigns in our homes, that we have good health and plenty of work."

New Deal Is Attacked

Branding the New Deal as "merely a new name for an old folly," Justice Mexey termed the Constitution a "citadel of human rights and a charter of economic liberalism.

"The American people,' he said, "must decide whether they will surrender this citadel and give up this charter and hereafter depend for their indivdual security and their governmental guidance on those who shall happen to be entrusted with the vast powers of a totalitarian state of 125,000,000 human beings. May they consider the problem well and not rush headlong into chaos."

Mrs. Simmons gave her views on what she said were the New Deal efforts to regiment the farmers, declaring that the conflict today was between individual liberty, the home and the family and some brand of socialism.

Miss Williams, former Democratic committeewoman from Tennessee, pleaded for an open mind and tolerance in approaching the national political situation.

As a spokesman for the New Deal, Senator Barkley reviewed the conditions which faced the country when President Roosevelt took office, and defended the steps taken by the administration to remedy them.

Senator Barkley pointed out that twenty acts of Congress from 1920 to 1930 were held unconstitutional.

Mrs. Langworthy, discussing the modern home, said that its most vital problem is the saving from semi-despair of high school graduates and those at the next lower level. They were, she said, "discontented, frustrated and full of a sense of injustice."

Dr. Frank told the congress that the greatest contribution schools and colleges can make to the maintenance of democracy is the training of men and women for the responsibilities of leadership and cultivation of popular understanding of the problems of the present day.

Colonel McCormick, who welcomed the women, spoke briefly on what the Constiution means to them.

"Bear well in mind," he said, "that whatever you have of freedom and of right is confined to the few pages upon which are written the Constitution of the United States and its amendments."

Dr. Irving S. Cutter, dean of the Northwestern University Medical School, told the women that they were the natural guardians of the welfare and health of the family. Upon them, he said, devolves the task of using simple lessons based on common sense and daily experiences to inculcate in their children the truth of health.

Henry Bentley of Cincinnati chairman of the Cincinnati City Charter Committee, called upon women to devote their intelligence and enthusiasm to the problems of cleaning up local politics.

unemployment because of lack of demand. Likewise, foundries and machine shops, which cannot use mass production methods bu rely on skilled labor, are running only 65.2 per cent in employment.

But the fact remains that the majority of people believe that machines, by reducing the need for labor, have put men out of work. Everybody knows of someone who used to have a good job but now has none because a modern invention came along with a machine that could do the work of 10, and thus displaced him.

See Picture in Wrong Light

This, say the Machinery Institute People, has led lay observers to conclude that there are now fewer jobs. They fail to see the picture as a whole, which would show new jobs created in other lines. There is also the factor of women in industry. A larger proportion of the population is doubless now seeking employment than in the year before the advent of machinery. But this is a sociological angle which the institute is not concerning itself with.

The institute admits also that there is a big social problem in the adjustment of workers during the periods of change in industry. While ultimately new jobs are created by the very machines that displace workers, the individual who losses his job may have a desperate time finding a new niche for himself.

Problem Ebbs and Flows

What is to be the solution of this very pressing human problem it does not attempt to say, but its staff holds that the problem is greatly accentuated in times of depression, and minimized to the vanishing point in good times, when it is comparatively easy for a displaced worker to find himself a job in another line.

It is this aspect of the problem which brought railroad executives into conference in Chicago this week. What to do to compensate workers who would be thrown out of jobs by economies of operation which the lines would like to adopt is the problem that is puzzling them.

Unions representing the workers are institing that the men be protected. There appears to be agreement on the point that some relief vidual so that the extreme hardships caused by the adjustment shall not fall upon a few.

Gas Motor Converted To Fuel Oil In Day, Detroit Firm Claims

Can the conventional automobile gasoline engine be converted to the use of fuel oil? It not only can, says the Nuway Engineering Corporation of Detroit, Mich., but it can be done within 10 to 12 hours.

Think of it. Drive your gasoline-motored car into the garage on the way to work in the morning and pick it up at night equipped with a motor that will cover 150 miles on as many gallons of oil as it formerly required in gasoline gallons to go 50 miles.

Added to this, you pay about 18 cents to do this 150 miles compared to approximately $1.80 that it would cost to go the same distance in a gasoline car.

These are some of the advantages claimed by salesmen for oil-burning motors. After three years of testing through dynamometers, the Nuway Corporation announces the development of an adapter said to successfully convert the ordinary gasoline engine into a fuel oil burner, according to the Christian Science Monitor. The motorist buys the adapter, which is shipped to the locality in the United States he lives in for installation.

While experimentation in oil-burners for automobiles has focused chiefly upon the development of an entirely new type of engine, various experts have attempted with more or less success to do what the Nuway Corporation claims to have accomplished. C. L. Cummins, pioneer in Diesels, claimed recently to have covered 100,000 miles in a ca requipped with a conventional gasoline motor converted to the use of oil. Such conversions, however, have not before proved practicable for marketing purposes.

Manufacturers have predicted that a Diesel-motored car would soon be offered for the market, but, according to Mr. Cummins, this will not be for several years yet. The Nuway Corporation takes an advanced step, however, in claiming satisfactory results with its adapter. At any rate, it is now expanding its plant facilities to take care of unfilled orders.

The conversion was made on a number of engines formerly using No. 1 grade gasoline. As oil-burners, they will take No. 1 fuel oil, obtainable only at this early stage in Diesel development at regular wholesale dealers. Ordinary automatic oil burners used for heating homes take No. 2 and No. 4 fuel oil.

For those who want to be technical —the fuel oil used is a 36 degree Baume gravity, 155 degrees Fahrenheit flashpoint and distillation of 10 per cent at 394 degrees Fahrenheit and 90 per cent at 465 degrees Fahrenheit with a 41 octane rating.

The tests have been made on marine, stationary and truck engines and several of the conversions were made on passenger cars with excellent results, the company reported. Dynamometer tests, at full throttle, maintain gasoline power with a decrease in volumetric consumption averaging 20 per cent.

Truck tests with road loads showed an increased mileage of more than 30 per cent. Besides the advantages to be gained from increased motor efficiency, the company points out a saving due to the difference in price of the two fuels. In most places fuel oil sells about 35 per cent less than gasoline.

Manila Republicans Terms Independence As 'Disastrous' Move

Domei

MANILA, March 7—The Tydings-McDuffie independence act, under which the Philippines are scheduled to be liberated from American rule in 1946, was flatly condemned as "disastrous" to the people of the Islands in a resolution adopted here today by a convention of American Republicans, residents of the Philippines.

"Behind the mask of idealism," declared the resolution, the economic provisions of the act, unless amended, "will ruin the people of the Islands and destroy industry, trade and commerce advantageous both to them and to the people of the United States."

The resolution further pointed out that the execution of the act, as at present contemplated, will "leave defenceless a Christian race which the United States undertook to guide and protetc from the domination and exploitation of the potential enemies of our ideals of government, religion, and standards of living."

Every Fall scenario writers, film directors and educational workers from such of the fifteen Soviet cinema factories as are to make children's movies meet in Moscow to adopt plans. Each factory submits a scheme for the season, with scenarios which are read aloud and voted upon by all. Before any film is produced, however, it goes through several "purgings." Audiences of children listen to the scenario while their reactions are checked by observers.

Movies, like radio broadcasts, are, so to speak, carefully tailored to fit three different age groups of children. And a 4-year-old would no more be expected to go to a movie for 13-year-olds than to wear the suit of a 13-year-old. Children as a rule go with their comrades from school or apartment house to specially arranged performances for their age group. At the theater a whole staff of workers puts them in the proper mood for the film. Musicians play appropriate selections in the lobby. Stories are read by way of prologue or children themselves may recite. Sometimes all take part in games and dances before the show.

So, too, the children's theaters with their battalions of specially trained actors, playwrights and designers, the little puppet shows which Russia has raised to new artistic heights, and the very games the Soviet children play are all supervised by pedagogues.

But the pedagogues who just now sit in the seats of control in Russia wear a less fearsome aspect than their name usually connotes. They are apt to lack the rigid, bureaucratic mien. To them, and largely to the joy-starved children they serve, theirs seems almost a Santa Claus role.

Shot through all the pedagogues' solemn phrases about broadening the child's knowledge and raising his cultural level in an almost tremulous eagerness to give him long-lacking laughter and fun.

DR PALMER SPEAKS

There was a large gathering of the Tokyo International Club at the Morinaga Cafe on Wednesday evening to hear Dr. Harold E. Palmer give what was likely to prove one of his last talks in Japan before leaving to take up his new post in London. Dr. Palmer plans to leave at the end of this month.

Dr. Yatsu, President of the International Club introduced the guest of honor. He said that Dr. Palmer had spent 14 years in Japan, a long and valuable spell of a most valuable life, and especially to Japan, where results proved that Dr. Palmer's research and practical guidance had brought about a great improvement in the study of English teaching. Dr. Yatsu added that Dr. Palmer's name was well-known throughout the country, not only because of his fourteen years' work to improve the teaching of English, but also because of his many-sided activities, since he was one of those rare men who are as versatile as they are thorough. Because of this Dr. Palmer's leaving would be a real loss to Japan, but happily the valuable results of his work would remain. All were grateful for what he had so loyally done for Japan, and all wished him the best of good fortune and success in his new post and future work.

In opening his talk, Dr. Palmer referred to the individual muddling along of nations, but if they were to continue to muddle would it not be better, he asked, to muddle along with some agreed standard, though better still with the maximum of economy and the minimum of friction. In his usual systematic manner, and with his customary humour, Dr Palmer then proceeded to outline the various devices, schemes, inventions etc., which had been deliberately planned by the nations of the world and which had made for international standardization. The speaker divided the many schemes into three categories—those which had been accepted without resistance (though doubtless resisted at one time), those which were formerly resisted but which today are accepted at least in principle, and finally those schemes which are still resisted, though locally or by groups.

For example, under the first category, i.e.the accepted schemes, there were the Marine Code of Signals; under the secnd category the Metric System, and under the third such things as the Classification of Sciences and Books, International format for paper, and, added Dr. Palmer, amid a roar of laughter, Street Names in Japan.

Dr. Palmer then proceeded to point out that there were cerain schemes which appeared to belong to categories two and three. These were Modern Methods of Language Teaching, International Phonetic Notatin, Direct Method of teaching languages, Vocabularly Control, Construction Patterns, Romanization on Phonemic Lines, and an Auxiliary Language, chiefly artificial.

In this last part of his talk Dr. Palmer was specially interesting, and his remarks were frequently punctuated by applause and expressions of approval among his audience, who represented many nations.

It was inevitable that such a subject and so adequate a treatment of it should cause several to ask questions of Dr. Palmer at the end of his talk. Perhaps the most important question put to him from the point of view of the different peoples and their callings as represented by the gathering was whether Dr. Palmer would advocate the teaching of Esperanto instead of English in Japan. Dr. Palmer was most emphatic in his reply. "Certainly not" he said, and added "I am a believer in an artificial language, but I do not recommend it in place of English in Japan. As an auxiliary language to Japan's natural second language, which is English, yes, but I do not suppose that for some fifty years at least any artificial language will replace English in Japan." Later, Dr. Palmer was applauded for his succinct and clear explanation of the difficult distinction between "Ponemic" and "phonetic." A firm believer in the Berlitz system of teaching languages, Dr. Palmer said that he believed there was no better system evolved for the first fifteen or twenty lessons, due to the method of teaching the most essential words first. He added, however, that he believed the system was wrong in wasting so much time over explaining certain things to the pupil in his the language he was learning which could be explained in a few moments, and clearly understood, in the student's mother tongue. As a telling analogy, Dr. Palmer compared the teaching of shorthand through the medium of shorthand itself, which evidently would be a long job. The Berlitz weakness then is that it is not pliant enough, as it was 100 per cent direct, and like all extremes carried its one vice at least.

In concluding his interesting talk, Dr. Palmer appealed for a more objective judgment in dealing with international schemes, and expressed the hope that foolish and futile resistances against the schemes he had outlined, and others too, might cease, and that reason and judgment might replace mere prejudice in the world today.

Mrs. Sanger Reviews Her Trip In India, Relates Experiences

Mrs. Margaret Sanger, internationally famous birth control leader, reviewed today in an interview at the Imperial hotel her 10 crowded weeks in India, declaring that 90 per cent of her addresses were given to husbands who were thoroughly converted to the birth control movement and eager for information regarding it.

A story which she said she will never be able to forget is that of a destitute Indian woman of 25 who had four children and, with her six months old baby, had been sent by her husband to the city in which she was speaking. The husband had given his wife all their savings so that she could make the trip.

But the woman who had travelled several hundred miles to see Mrs Sanger found her surrounded by secretaries and important people and was unable to get the interview she wished.

"But she was smart," Mrs. Sanger continued. "She learned what train I was taking that night and bought a first class ticket—the Indians always ride third class—so that she would be on the same coach as I. After the train started, she introduced herself and I was able to answer her questions. She got off at the next station."

Mrs. Sanger believed that this story illustrates the great desire of India's millions for facts about birth control. She was particularly interested to know that this young woman lived in a matriarchal state, Travancore, which Mrs. Sanger believed is probably the only such state left in the world.

Turning her attention to the United States, the visitor said that in the New York birth control clinic which is the largest in the world, information is being given to families on relief. In the last 10 years, she said there has been a marked change in the type of people seeking information. Formerly older people came to her clinic. Today she is working with young people. Those who can afford to pay are doing so, others are being served without cost.

Upon her arrival at the Imperial Hotel Thursday, Mrs. Sanger gave a three-hour interview to the Hochi Shimbun whose reporters took the questions and answers in shorthand. The story of that interview is to be published under featured headlines in three successive issues of the paper. Baronss Shizue Ishimoto who studied under Mrs. Sanger in New York, was present at the interview and helped with the interpretation. Mrs. Edward Gauntlett, another long-time friend of Mrs. Sanger, was also present.

Accompanying the visitor is Miss Anna May Phillips, a reporter on the Pittsburgh Post Gazette, who is acting as Mrs. Sanger's secretary. Miss Phillips had met Mrs. Sanger many times when she was assigned by her paper to interview that leader and when Mrs. Sanger was about to leave on her round-the-world trip, she asked the newspaper woman who had written so many good stories about her, to accompany her. An old hand at the newspaper business, Miss Phillips was none the less startled when she saw Japanese journalism, as evidenced by the Hochi Shimbun, at work and when she heard some of the direct questions of the reporters, she was more amazed, asking, "Do you mean to say they can print that here?"

Mrs. Sanger said that when she arrived in Kobe she was told that a Japanese firm had been selling contraceptives which bore her name. She was indignant at this for, as she explained, she has never allowed her name to be used on any commercial product although she has frequently been offered small fortunes if she would do this. She did not see any advertisements of the products in Kobe and she was told that as soon as news came of her expected visit, all advertisements and posters were taken down. Had she found any, she said she most certainly would have brought suit against the offenders.

Borah Demands Open Ohio Fight

the people of Ohio is the question: Who is he in favor of nominating? What is his secret?

"I am told he is for Mr. Hoover. Very well. It would not be discreditable for him to say so publicly. Let's see whether the people of Ohio agree with him, whoever he is for. Why not declare his position?

"It does not help the voter who he is against unless they know who he is for. He should take the people of his State who have honored him greatly into his confidence and come out openly for his candidate and thus assist in securing an open unhampered expression of the voters.

"The truth is, and there is no need to try to conceal it from the mind of average intelligence, that the favorite son proposition is a sham and a deception. Likewise, the uninstructed delegation plan is to enable all kinds of trading and manipulating in the selection of a man for the high office of the Presidency.

Challenge Over "Old Deal"

"Mr. Fess also says that if we are going to have the New Deal, then why not vote for President Roosevelt direct instead of for me? That is an important question to be submitted. But it is equally important to know what kind of a deal Mr. Fess is for. Is he for the Old Deal?

"My opinion is that, while the people may have their objections to the New Deal, they are not going back to the Old Deal. They at least want a Square Deal, and the first evidence of a Square Deal is to give them an opportunity to express themselves at the polls.

"It will be an interesting sight at Cleveland to see these people who have refused to come into the open and give the people an opportunity to vote in the matter of selecting a candidate when they come to draw their planks about popular government and the dangers of popular government.

"A scheme, or system, which deprives the people of a part in selecting the candidate for President is a travesty upon popular government, and all platform declarations which may be written will not eliminate that thought from the minds of the voters on Nov. 3."

Gustav Mahler's Works Typical Of 19th Century

genuine artist has properly to procure his inspiration, is a question better left out of discussion. Certainly, personal experiences and impressions have essentially influenced Mahler's creative fancy. That irresistibly pitching march rhythm, so characteristic of many of his symphony movements to which it gives their feature—a warlike, militant feature—may be traced back to early impressions and influences of the environing world. Reminiscences of soldierlike sounds which the child's ear had caught, reminiscences of the view of troops, marching under the songs, and of military signals and fanfares, which sounded over from the neighbouring barrackyard, have been translated into basic musical substance which the symphonic composer used as material for themes.

The landscape of his Bohemian country, and still more the landscape of the Austrian Alps where he felt thoroughly at home, have ever again enriched the horizon of his musical imagination; from this atmosphere originated most of his scherzo movements, in which the rhythm and melody of rural dances predominate. Incidentally, such things are found in all Austrian symphonic music, from Haydn to Mahler. But certanly, also Mahler never thought at making folk-lore studies there. There cannot be anything more genuinely and unmistakably Mahlerian than, for instance, such a symphonic scherzo, or such one of his warlike, marching allegro movements from where ever their basic musical substance may have been taken. The creative genius does not care about the source and we only care for the creative genius.

Much was startling and excitingly new in Mahler's symphonies, when they appeared; much has, since, become familiar to the musical car. But, stil generations of musicians could learn much from Mahler. Especially, as to his incomparable art of orchestration, proceeding from Berlioz to whom he was, as a musical phenomenon, similar in some respects, rather than proceeding from Wagner, it seems indeed, as though this art is strange to a time in which the post-Wagnerian, post-Romantic orchestra more and more degenerates to a means of veiling musical substance, or its absence. Mahler's orchestra does not veil, but reveals; it does not efface, but explains; it does not adorn, but proclaims.

In the utmost impressiveness and simultaneous asceticism with which the absolute musical conception is worked out plastically and accoustically up to the smallest details, this orchestration becomes the reflection of an artistic character of reckless veracity, reckless even against himself. Mahler's technique of orchestration seems formed to his character; the almost paradoxical synthesis of technique and character reveals the secret of his orchestral idiom, which is as convincing in its categorical determination, as it is irresistibe in its sculpture-like conciseness and power.

Directed Vienna Opera

Mahler's orchestra—and, for instance, Strauss' orchestra are not only two kinds of technique, they are two different worlds. Mahler's world is that of the musically absolute. With Strauss, who subordinates music to the picturesque vision and the literary idea, the orchestra becomes a means to serve decorative and illustrative ends. His way, logically, led him to the opera—it is in this way that, almost without exception, all composers of the age were driven. It remains a remarkable fact that Mahler, who was director of the Vienna Opera during ten years—and these ten years were the period of its prime—has, as a composer, never departed from his symphonic life plan. As an opera director, who, a born musician, was an unequalled orchestra leader, he has in the classical master works, in Beethoven's Fidelio, Mozart's, and Cluck's operas, and in how many others too? realized in an unheard of perfection Wagner's principle of the "total work of art" ("Gesamtkunstwerk"), in which all individual arts cooperate to serve the whole.

As a symphonic composer, he remained the sovereign creating musician, who also used human language and the human voice as a means of artistic expression, but never has he submitted the musically absolute to any non-musical conception. Nothing could be more typical of his composing manner, than the way in which, in the Eighth Symphony, he has connected a Latin church hymn with the closing scene from Goethe's "Faust"—not to a poetical whole, of course, but in the service of a symphonic whole.

Wherever in Mahler's symphonies the instrumental idiom of the orchestra and the idiom of the sung word, sung by solo voices or by the chorus, are connected, the latter does not proclaim a program in the sense of program music, but it opens to us a world of ideas and visions which filled the mind and were the inspiration of the composer, and reveals to us the spiritual and intellectual background of his composing process.

Composer of Works

In the same way, there is an intimate connection between Mahler's pure instrumental symphonies, and his lieder. Out of the "Kindertotenlieder" developed his Fifth, out of the "Lieder Eines Fahrenden Gesellen" the First. Mahler himself was the (at the time of publication anoymous) author of the "Lieder Eines Fahrenden Gesellen", simple, touching pieces, like folk songs, in which nevertheless all the characteristics of the later symphony composer may be traced. Mahler has not become a poet; the verses which the musician sought, he found later in the collection of poems "Aus des Knaben Wunderhorn". The popular underlying note of the Wunderhorn poems, and of the lieder which Mahler made of them, became the underlying note of his whole symphonic work. The years in which the Wunderhorn lieder were composed, were for Mahler perhaps the years of the happiest musical inspiration: the Second, Third and Fourth Symphonies, which are the so called "Wunderhorn Symphonies", prove it.

It is the Fourth which, as the last of the series, forms at the same time a culminating point in Mahler's work: a point of culmination, and of repose before the tempests of the Fifth. Having originated in the happiest human circumstances, it is music of blessing purity and of the utmost personal immediatenese of expression; predominating in it is that almost child-like serenity, of which Mahler's contemporaries have found it so difficult to believe the genuineness.

History Of Screen Told In New Cal. Museum

when you must know the truth. I will no longer be silent"; "Stop me if you dare! I will scream and the town will ring with the scandal of John Schuyler." These are average illustrations; there are funnier ones.

If the drama was crude, the technique was little better. Lighting of some of the early films was so bad that enterprising nickelodeon proprietors hired lecturers—or "spielers" to stand near the screen and describe to the audiences what was transpiring.

"The man and his wife board a train," they would say, "and now they begin their journey. Will they arrive safely? What has Fate is store for them?"

A second later it would be:

"In the distance is an approaching train. The agent attempts to switch it to another track. But he was too late. Now the trains are speeding to destruction. They crash!"

Griffith's Effect

To D. W. Griffith is generally given credit for most of the advances in cinema technique. He was the first director to use the close-up as a device for indicating emotional reactions. It seems incredible, but audiences sometimes hooted and stamped when the camera suddenly moved in from a full-length view to a close-up. Early producers protested, too, saying that as long as they were paying for a whole actor it was foolish to use only half of him in a scene.

But Griffith persevered and won his fight. With the close-up, the scenery-biting actor was doomed. Alarm no longer had to be expressed by a violent uplifting of the hands and an exaggerated recoil. The revolution was not accomplished over night, but it was well begun.

Ever more steadily, the hand of Griffith began to mold the motion picture into something approaching its modern state. The camera became mobile and started following the players when they walked or ran, instead of remaining rooted to one spot while the actors made their entrances and exits before it.

Episodes were shortened, divided into close-ups and long shots. Directors began to seek new methods of dissolving from scene to scene. The use of parallel of action—an example would be a scene of the villain and the girl struggling, a flash of the hero riding to the rescue, another glimpse of the struggle, the hero is nearer, the heroine is overpowered, the hero breaks though the door—heightened dramatic effect, increased the tempo.

The length of films increased. From 50 feet they advanced to 200, then to 400, to 600 and 800. Soon the news-reeler, of 1,000 feet, became the standard nickelodeon length. When Griffith turned out his first two-reeler, exhibitors were aghast. They offered to run it in two parts, calling on "The Trust" and the other "The Trust Fulfilled." Their audiences, they insisted, would not submit to more than ten minutes of any picture.

Stars And Salaries

Meanwhile new stars beyond the ken of astronomers had entered the sky. A golden-haired girl named Gladys Smith had gone to work for Griffith for $5 a day; she grew up to be Mary Pickford. A little fellow from the London music halls had listened to a $125-a-week offer from Mack Sennett, commissioner of the Keystone cops. His name was Charlie Chaplin. Francis X. Bushman and Beverley Bayne began to crowd out Maurice Costello. Dorothy and Lillian Gish succeeded Florence Lawrence, the Biography Girl, and Florence Turner, the Vitagraph Girl. Roscoe Arbuckle, Ford Sterling and Ben Turpin converted the custard pie into a national institution.

Griffith's two-reeler succeeded. In a few years the four and six reeler mounted more than proportionately had become commonplace. Costs to the increased footage. Feature films approached the $100,000 mark. Griffith's "Birth of a Nation," which is still a gripping photoplay, cost $90,000 but was heralded as a million-dollar production.

With other spectacles, including "Cabiria," "Ben-Hur," "Quo Vadis," "The Four Horsemen of the Apocalypse" and "The Big Parade," the screen moved into the big-money class. The real $1,000,000 picture was just around the corner, and there, preparing to greet it, were the lavish cinema palaces.

So went the history of the screen. Advances were so rapid that audiences scarcely were conscious of the changes going on before their eyes. Today, when they see the museum's revivals, they will wonder how they managed to sit through some of the early—and not so early—dramas without breaking into the loud laughter that now seems their only possible reward.

One explanation would be that the average filmgoer of today grew up with the movies. He saw pictures as regularly as he saw his friends at school; they reached adulthood together without either being conscious of the physical and mental changes that time had wrought.

But this would not account for the slightly older generation that had attained intelligent maturity when the fledgling screen still was making its awkward efforts to fly. How did they manage to endure the early films?

Modern Phenomena

The answer seems to be that there is very little evidence that they did sit enthralled through the early epics. Probably—and this should wipe the superior smile from little Willie's face—they reacted not differently from contemporary adults to such modern phenomena as television and radio, which in all probability will be marvels of crudity in the eyes of the next generation.

It is, in essence, not so much a matter of change of entertainment taste as of entertainment technique. Theda Bara's 1914 vamp is ridiculous today, not because she was a vamp, but because she did her vamping in that way. In the pre-war years there were only two kinds of women—good and bad. Theda had to be the bad one, and nothing was too bad for her, not even the photography. Now, under the "Green Hat" influence, we concede that a bad woman still may be a heroine. Or we poke fun at the whole idea by giving the role to Mae West or Jean Harlow, knowing that they will turn sex into comedy.

All this leads to the museum's theory that the film, as Art, is a social document which conveys a significant story quite apart from that which it tells on the screen. The museum's chieftains hold that every picture imparts in some subtle way the flavor, the mental and moral outlook of its time. They have decided, after looking at hundreds of new and old pictures made here and abroad, that every film dates itself and becomes not merely a photoplay but a revealing cross-section of life.

That is why the museum, in its official capacity, refuses to laugh at the cinema's primitives or regard them simply as comic portraits in the family album. And there is another perfectly good reason for not being too superior in the presence of these old pictures: if we laugh too heartily at the chromos of 1916, we shall have no defense at all against 1956's laughter at the chromos of today.

No one can be sure what the cinema's next twenty years may bring. But you may be certain it will be something quite unlike the motion-picture art of today. Why, even Shirley Temple will be grown up!

Spider Big Eater

The world's biggest eater is the ordinary house spider, according to South German entomologists.

They have discovered that it eats four times its own weight for breakfast, nine times its weight for lunch and thirteen times its weight for dinner.

It thus consumes a minimum of 25 times its own weight every day in insect meals. To equal this ration the average man would have to eat some 1½ tons of food a day!

trality"—an interpretation of the incident with which committee members did not concur.

The other evidence came from the Army Ordnance Association, a patriotic defense agency which was shown, as in the case in the Navy League the previous day, to contain on its membership rolls the names of individuals who might profit financially from the program of industrial mobilization for war which it advocated.

Suggested Means to an End

Concerned by the unpopularity of the munitions industry resulting from the vigorous publicity campaign against it of last year, L. C. Codd, executive secretary of the association, wrote to Maj. Gen. J. F. C. Fuller, British Army, asking an authoritative article on the subject.

To illustrate his point that the "chief culprits" are the middle men or contractors who usually have no connection with any manufacturing firm, the general said that if he were one of them he would "dine the minister of war produce the fairest of fair ladies and them suggest that his country's army wanted a new machine gun.

"He would say, 'How much do I get?' I would say, '10 per cent'; and I would go to Vickers or some other firm and say, 'I want 500 machine guns at a price which will enable me to scoop 30 per cent'—20 per cent for myself and 10 per cent for the minister. The general result is the high price of armaments."

"It is rather a dirty business and most difficult to get to the bottom of, because the main profits are secret transactions," General Fuller commented.

Hitler Reveals New Synthetic Rubber Tires

automobiles. Such a system, he explained, would make it possible to produce more cars on a mass basis at a low selling price and thus open a way to export markets.

These foreign markets could be opened up, he asserted, only if, through mass production, selling prices were brought down to new levels hitherto unknown in the Reich motor industry. He expressed confidence that the German motor business would prove capable of the task before it.

Production Figures Up

Figures given in the ceremony today in connection with the motor show disclosed rapid progress made by the German automobile industry in the last three years under government patronage. Production of cars and trucks for private and domestic consumption increased from 46,000 in 1932 to 215,000 in 1935. These figures do not include motor vehicles destined for the army, postal service and state railways.

It was announced that the German dye trust had stated that the term coined to describe the new artificial rubber composition was "butadien," and that the principal elements were calcium and substances obtained from coal, combined in varying proportions according to the type of rubber desired. The finished products collectively are termed "buna."

The dye trust said that increasingly better qualities had been obtained and that one type of soft rubber produced had shown itself to be more resistant to heat than the products of natural rubber. The statement said that this quality was especially important in tires.

In his speech, Hitler disclosed also that the army had experimented with the new tires throughout the past year and that superior wearing qualities of the new product had been shown in these experiments.

Sausage Saves Dachshund

A dachshund's life has been saved by a sausage in Bavaria.

The dog had been caught in a fox-hole and had become frightened 20 feet underground. For 22 hours, the Kastl fire brigade labored in vain to free him. Then one of the firemen had a brainwave.

He pushed down the hole a long pole with a sausage and a torch on the end.

The hungry dog sniffed the sausage and—its confidence restored—followed the light to the surface. There he was restored, unharmed, to his master.

SPRING FASHION SHOW IN TOKYO

Dresses and coats which Madame Adelia Hazama has designed for Japanese girls and women are being shown at the Shirokiya department store this week. Mannequins display the garments at various hours daily and the show will continue until Sunday.

Madame Hazama, the wife of Mr. Inosuke Hazama, an oil painter, recently returned from France where she made a special study of fashions. In regard to her present show, she says that while fashions in New York and Paris show a definite masculine trend this spring, she did not follow this trend in designing garments for the spring show. She does not think masculine styles are suitable for Japanese women who require softer, truly feminine frills. She does not think Japanese women should blindly copy Paris styles but take only what is becoming to them. It was what she considered the becoming features which she took for her spring style, she declared.

The dresses in the display are made from textile manufactured in Japan.

Soviets Force Peasants Into Cotton Fields

Resistance Not Overcome In Central Asia, Where 1934 Crop Failed

Graphic details of the grim struggle to drive on the indolent peasants of Central Asia and Southern Russia to harvest a record cotton crop are given in the provincial newspapers of these regions, where the cultivation and harvesting of cotton have become the absorbing interest not only of local inhabitants but of the ruling Communist Party. The Party has insisted that cotton plantations must compensate for last year's unsatisfactory harvest by delivering to the state this year a minimum of 1,515,000 tons or 6,312,000 bales.

Last year's partial crop failure was due to an active and passive revolt in Central Asian cotton fields. The Kremlin therefore sent in this year experienced Party organizers and the political police to reorganize the planting and harvesting of cotton, says the Moscow correspondent of the Christian Science Monitor, whose article follows:

Still Resisting

Nevertheless, the Tashkent newspaper Pravda Vostoka reports a number of incidents which indicate that the passive resistance of Central Asian peasants has not been fully overcome, although it apparently has not reached the stage of open revolt, as it did last year, when more than 100 persons were shot and thousands were exiled.

Pravda Vastoka declared that in the Fergana and Bokhara districts, the center of last year's revolt, only the women freely agreed to pick cotton this September. It was explained that the male tribesmen, traditionally opposd to this type of work, refused to assist. In one district where there are 12,000 collectivized peasants, the newspaper reported that only 500 worked in the fields.

The newspaper published an order to Party organizers and the machine-tractor stations, in which Communists predominate, to mobilize every able-bodied person for work in the fields, and to see that workers go into the fields early in the morning and work a full day.

Suasians, First

Persuasian as well as coercion is being exerted to enlist all workers in the harvest. Organizers were directed to pay without delay the premiums fixed for exceptional work. But they were also instructed to "apply adequate measures to shirkers and all those who fail to attain their norm."

In spite of the difficulties encountered, Party organizers express confidence that this year's harvest will greatly exceed that of last year. The weather has been favorable and planting was better organized. Local labor has been supplemented by thousands of men and women from European Russia, sent to work in the cotton fields. Some of these are political prisoners directed by the political police.

Unfamiliar with cotton cultivation, the untrained laborers sometimes have made serious mistakes. The newspapers report that cotton was picked green and its value lost. Delivery to the state was delayed by some collectives, with consequent deterioration and loss.

Irritations

An impression of frantic endeavor to speed up the indolent Central Asian tribesmen and untrained imported laborers is gained from reading the local newspapers, which admit that the task is more difficult because food distribution has not yet been properly organized in Central Asia, and workers are irritated and kept from work by being compelled to stand in line for hours to buy food.

However, the new organizers this year are tested Communists, some of whom gained experience in the grain regions of the Ukraine and North Caucasus during the passive revolt of 1931 and 1932. They are determined to accomplish in Central Asia what they did in the grain regions.

In Central Asia they have an additional instrument to persuade recalcitrant peasants to fall into line with the Kremlin's policies. The conversion of millions of acres of grain lands to cotton has given the Government a firm hold upon the food supply, which is brought in from Siberia over the Turkestan-Siberian railway. The Communists are therefore in a position to enforce their theory that only those persons shall be adequately fed who are willing to work for their food.

Losing No Time

"Now, suppose," said the teacher, "a man working on the river bank suddenly fell in. He could not swim and would be in danger of drowning. Picture the scene. The man's sudden fall, the cry for help. His wife knows his peril and, hearing his screams, rushes immediately to the bank. Why does she rush to the bank?"

Whereupon a boy exclaimed, "To draw his insurance money."—Santa Fe Magazine.

Einstein's Relativity Theory Is Held Upset

error, Dr. Cartmel stated, is not due to an error at all but is the actual result of the effect of the earth's motion on the ray of light. The experimenters really had obtained the results they had been looking for and threw them away without knowing their significance, he contends.

Perfect Adjustment a Defect

The trouble with Michelson and Morley and other experimenters, Dr. Cartmel reported having discovered, lies in the very nature of the interferometer. They all tried to get a perfect adjustment, he said, but if you get a perfect adjustment the results must be exactly the same, by the very nature of things, for both arms. If you want to get the real difference in time between the two beams of light it is absolutely essential to avoid perfect adjustment of the instrument.

"The most remarkable results," Dr. Cartmel said, "are those obtained by Professor Miller, who was not interested in adjusting the instrument with such perfection as to obtain nil results. What he wanted to find out was the meaning of the experiment when the instrument was so adjusted as to give some positive results.

"After many discouraging years of hard work he made the important discovery that at 6 o'clock in the evening in the month of September he obtained only a quarter of the effect he obtained at any other time, indicating some sort of change in the earth's velocity at that particular time every year.

Two Motions of Earth

"Professor Miller has been able to show that the earth, in addition to its motion of thirty kilometer per second in its orbit around the sun, has another motion at right angles to its orbit, with a velocity of 290 kilometers per second. This motion affects the sun also and the whole solar system is flying through space with this enormous velocity.

"The combination of the two motions of the earth, one the orbital motion around the sun and the other its motion through space with the rest of the solar system, gives the earth a motion along a spiral path, the motion at any instant of time being along a tangent to this spiral.

"The variation of the direction of the earth's motion along this spiral path satisfactorily explains the fact that the effect of the earth's motion on a ray of light at 6 o'clock in the evening in the month of September in only a quarter of its usual value.

"This result so marvelously deduced by Professor Miller from his measurements of the behavior of a ray of light in the Michelson interferometer is destined to become one of the greatest contributions to scientific knowledge."

Dr. Paul R. Heyl, Bureau of Standards physicist, stated that if Dr. Cartmel's deductions are substantiated experimentally it will mean that the theory of relativity will have to be discarded. Until such experimental proof is available, he added, Dr. Cartmel's work must be classed along with similar attempts to challenge the Einsteinian concepts, upon which rests in large part our present understanding of the physical universe.

Hiranuma Sketches Portrait Of Self During Interview

New President Of Privy Council Reviews Early Life

Dr. Kiichiro Hiranuma, new President of the Privy Council gave a sketch of his career at a press interview at his residence in Nishi-Okubo in Yodobashi-ku. His statement follows:

"As my father was the principal retainer of the feudal clan of Matsudaira in Tsuyama in Okayama Prefecture, I sought to present myself at the feudal castle as a playmate of the feudal Lord's heir, Yasunori Matsudaira. In those days the whole country was under the potent spell of Occidental civilization, the people being simply mad about this alien culture and all things Western.

"I was compelled to study English from the very early age of six. I was also very fond of play, and 'go' in which I had a very keen interest at that time, it is still one of my favorite pastimes. It was at the time that telegraph service was first opened in Japan, when the people in general were under the impression that men and mail matter were conveyed by the wires themselves.

"My hobbies are 'utai', 'no', 'archery' and 'go'. I firmly believe that right music and fine arts have the merit of pacifying one's feeling and guiding one's mind along the right path. For Japanese, Japanese music and fine arts are the best, I believe. Here argument about guilding the national idea along the right path is no good; the educational authorities in particular should pay greater attention to music and the fine arts from the standpoint of national education.

"I practice archery for mental training. I do not care whether the arrow shot by me hits the target or not. The main point is one's spirit. I am convinced that one can always do well in archery provided one does at it in the right mental and bodily attitude.

"I have remained single not as a matter of principle. I was rather weak in health in my youth, and I have thus lost my chance to get married."

EXPLANATION OF TODAY'S CARTOON

Shot Out His Appendix

Captain Stanley Beatty of the Kansas City, Kansas, Police Department recently shot it out with two escaped convicts, killing one and seriously wounding the other. Captain Beatty was shot during the battle, one bullet entering his body in the abdomen, completely and cleanly amputating his appendix. Beatty was rushed to the hospital and attended by Dr. Hobson, Police Department surgeon, who found that the assailant's bullet had severed the appendix as perfectly as a surgeon's knife could have done it. The intestine was closed, the wound dressed, and Captain Beatty recovered without any complication or infection.

British 'War' Order Cited For 1,000,000 Sandbags

As an indication that Great Britain is making preparations for war, a rush order for a million sand bags has been given to British prisons, Dr. Alfred Salter, Laborite M. P., told a meeting of business men arranged by the London Missionary Society recently.

He said he had heard that the prisoners were working such long hours that they were protesting and discipline had been broken in several prisons. He said he proposed to raise the matter in the House of Commons.

The Prison Commissioners at Whitehall admitted that "a smallish order for sand bags was being carried out in the ordinary way" and that recently there had been an order for half a million bags, but they denied that the prisoners were working overtime or that there had been any breakdown of discipline.

Digested But Unread

"Digested but unread" is the explanation why certain reading of the depth of New River, Virginia, cannot be filed.

The readings were being taken in connexion with a proposed dam. They were sent daily to the surveyer's office.

One day the readings failed to arrive. Instead came an explanatory note from the engineer:

"The readings are lost with no hope of recovery. The gauge reader's baby ate them."

French Border Church Flies Huge Nazi Flag

A huge Nazi flag on the north tower of the parish church in Heining les Bouzonville, France, led to an investigation by indignant authorities of this Saar frontier village.

They found that, although the priest is French and the services are conducted in French, the north half of the church is in Germany territory and some of the parishioners live there, a recent report in the New York Herald Tribune, which added that the Nazi flag still flew from the flagstaff when it was written.

Britain To Fortify Mombasa

Mombasa, chief port of the British colony of Kenya, and one of the finest harbors on the east coast of Africa, is to be fortified, it has been learned. Heavy guns and searchlights were expected to arrive there sometime this month, according to a New York Herald Tribune report. This step in in no way connected with the war in Ethiopia, the Mombasa defense having been planned for a long time.

U.S. Isolationist Policy Is Explained By Borah

in the light of the movement United States, in adopting a policy of neutrality, is standing in the way of world peace or occupies the position of an immoral and selfish nation, is the most transparent piece of propaganda that has afflicted this country since the World War.

"And let us bear in mind that, while as to some things which tend to interfere with our policy of neutrality, the nation may deal with them through legislation or through administration."

Senator Borah then turned to criticism of a basic idea underlying the League of Nations—the imposition of collective action against an aggressor nation.

Indicting a Nation

"Something could be said, and perhaps should be said, about the plan of rendering judgment against a nation supposed to be an aggressor," he asserted.

"Edmund Burke declared he knew of no way by which to draw an indictment against an entire people. A way has now been found, not only to indict but to try and convict an entire people.

"This procedure does not concern us except in so far as it may be used as an inducement in a new guise to our mixing in the political affairs of Europe. When we see the plan applied to one nation and not to another and realize that in both instances the controlling forces were political, that natioal interests and national ambitions directed the course in each instance, we must readily perceive that an aggressor is not one who has broken a convenant or attacked a small nation, but one which has transgressed the zone of interests of some other nation.

Justification for War

"The judgment of such a tribunal, when thus secured, is either a futility or justification for war, as we now well know. Whatever may be the machinery or whatever may be the plans of European nations to deal with each other, it is not for us to inquire as to their wisdom, or unwisdom, but it is perfectly evident that the forces which dominate are the same under whatever name they may be called into action.

"While I have no purpose to discuss the subject in detail tonight, I could not subscribe to the theory that collective action against the supposed aggressor means peace. It inevitably means war unless the nation is too weak to resist, and then it means oppression.

Confusion Prevails

"It is confusion worse confounded to talk about employing force against a sovereign state as a state employs it against a citizen or subject. When the framers of the Federal Constitution were discussing the question of employing force against a sovereign state in the execution of a judgment of the Federal Court it was Hamilton, as I remember, who declared it was madness.

"The United States, in pursuing a course of neutrality, not only consults and serves the interests of her own people but under no reasonable rule of international conduct can be regarded as doing injustice to other nations.

World Affairs School 'Passes' Princeton Test

president of Princeton University, as the first chairman of the administrative committee, says the New York Herald Tribune.

"Conference" Instruction Method

A distinctive feature of the program, Mr. Poole's report says, is the modern "conferenc" method of instruction, by means of which public problems of the day are attacked. In their round-table conferences students meet with prominent figures in the fields under consideration for "a free exchange of question and answer."

Student participation in discussions is designed "To reach agreement," Mr. Poole says and adds, "the complexity and divided justice of almost all international and national issues are emphasized, together with the need for understanding, tolerance, balanced judgment, moderation in word and gearing."

Chief Justice Hughes has remarked upon this portion of the report that he liked "particularly" the conference method of dealing with public problems, and has expressed the belief that "A good many proposals would be brought 'down to earth' by this method of dealing with them and that students would swiftly see how easy it is to be controversial and would be greatly aided in the difficult task of reaching an intelligent appreciation."

Enrollment in the first year was forty-two; in the second, seventy, and in the third, eighty, which had been set as the maximum limit. This limit was increased to 100 in 1934, and the quota has been readily filled since that time. The school's enrollment, roughly one-tenth of Princeton upper classmen, constituted in 1934 "the top tenth in academic standing." Students are not admitted until junior year and must have better than average marks in their introductory courses in economics, politics and history.

The school has added to the university faculty Dr. Dana G. Munroe formerly chief of the Latin American division of the Department of State and Minister to Haiti, as professor of Latin American history and affairs: Dr. Harwood L. Childs, student of propaganda and public opinion, as associate professor of politics, and Dr. Eyler N. Simpson, formerly senior associate in Mexico of the Institute of Current World Affairs Dr. Simpson and Mr. Poole jointly conduct the conferences on public affairs.

Dr. Tyler Dennett, historical advisor to the Department of State was brought to the school in 1931 as professor of international relations, serving until 1934, when he was elected president of Williams College.

The report records, in illustration of the practical "give-and-take" of the conference method, that after Tammany and Republican representatives had been heard and questioned on the issue of a new charter for New York City, "the party adjourned to a Nassau Street restaurant and exchanges continued genially and profitably until after midnight."

Specific fields of study this year are the Black thirty-hour-week bill, the open door and American trade interests in the Orient, the position of the cotton textile industry in New England, the tariff reciprocity treaty with Canada, and the T. V. A.

Besides Chief Justice Hughes, Mr. Davis and Mr. Young, the advisory board includes Albert G. Mibank '96, Roland S. Morris '96, and William Church Osborn '83, university trustees; Van Santvoord Merle-Smith '11, and Mr. Poole, counselor of the United States Embassy in Berlin before coming to Princeton.

Belgium Imposes Curbs On Refugees From Reich

A decree was published in Brussels Belgium, on February 22 creating a committee to supervise control of foreign refugees in Belgium. Regulations were to be instituted governing their sojourn in the country, and it was stated that all refugees must make a declaration to the Belgian authorities within eight days after their entry.

The decree chiefly affects Jewish refugees from Germany, who have been entering Belgium in large numbers, according to the New York Times. Up to the present a large proportion has consisted of wealthier Jews who have passed on to other countries, but the number without resources has lately been considerably increasing.

Boy Giant In U.S. Nears Record Size

8 Ft. 4 In., He Has To Grow Less Than Inch To Be Tallest Man In Verified Annals

The, world's tallest boy, a shy bespectacled youth standing slightly under 8 feet 4 inches, celebrated his eighteenth birthday at Alton, Ill. on February 22. He is within an inch of the height of the tallest man known to medical annals.

Mythology and folklore abound in tales of men of heroic stature, but physicians, ever dubious of the legendary, agree that if Robert Wadlow, 390-pound college freshman, grows to 8 feet 5 inches he will be the tallest man whose measurements have been scientifically verified, says the New York Times, whose article continues:

And doctors say that he may exceed 8 feet 6 inches—if his pituitary gland, the tiny pea-like gland at the base of the brain which controls growth, continues to overfunction.

Claims have been made by circus giants of height as great as 9 feet, but check-ups have disclosed that most of these men were substantially under 8 feet. Robert's closest authentic rival for the all-time human altitude record is perhaps the famed "Irish giant," Charles Byrne (O'Brien), who, an authority asserts, was more than 8 feet 4 inches tall when he died in 1783 at the age of 23. Byrne's skeleton is preserved in the Royal College of Surgeons in London.

Many Are Weak Physically

Scientific investigation has dispelled the "super-man" aura surrounding giants. A few, such as Primo Carnera, the boxer, are powerful and vigorous, but most are victims of a malady which gives them size beyond strength, or, if it does endow with strength, robs of the coordination that alone can make it effective.

Such is Robert. At 9 he was easily able to hoist aloft his 150-pound father. At 18 he is forced to guard carefully against loss of footing. A fall that would only shake up an ordinary man might prove disastrous to his weakened frame.

Robert's case is almost unique in medical history. In most instances of giant stature, unusual growth does not begin until after puberty. Robert, however, was of unusual size before he was a year old and had attracted widespread attention by his second birthday.

Weighing only nine pounds at birth, he has grown rapidly but steadily, not in spurts. His parents, Mr. and Mrs. Harold T. Wadlow, and his brothers and sisters—Helen, 16; Eugene, 14; Betty, 12, and Harold Jr., 3½—are of normal height. No other member of the family on either side has been of abnormal stature.

Robert is serious beyond his years. He is popular with boys of his own age. He speaks softly and is curiously gentle for one so massive.

His muscular coordination, however, has lagged and his movements are slow and deliberate.

Tour Offers Rejected

He dislikes to draw public attention. His parents, although his father earns only a moderate income as an oil company engineer, have refused offers to take him on exhibition tours.

At exercises closing his high school career last month he wore a size 8½ cap and the gown was 51 inches around the chest and 92 inches from collar to hem. The sleeve length was 55 inches. He wears size 39 shoes. They cost $36 a pair.

Robert—he likes to be called Bob—is a conscientious student and ranked well above the average in high school. He is now attending Shurtleff College here on a scholarship. His favorite subject is German.

An able speaker, Robert hopes to enter the legal profession, a field in which, he feels, his size will not be an insurmountable obstacle. His pet hobby is photography.

Few predict that he will reach 9 feet, although his rate of growth has shown no marked decrease. The average person reaches full stature during his eighteenth year, but late growth reaching into the early twenties is common among those with an overdeveloped pituitary.

Great Heights of Past

The most famous early English giant of whom anything is definitely known was John Middleton, whose epitaph reads: Here lyeth the bodie of John Middleton the childe. Nine feet three. Borne 1578. Dyede 1623."

Among the eighteenth century giants were Henry Blackmer, the "English giant," whose well-proportioned frame took London by storm in December, 1752, and Daniel Cajanus, the "Swedish giant," a contemporary. Blackmer was four inches shorter than the 7 foot 8 inch Cajanus.

Chang-woo-goo, the Chinese giant exhibited in London in 1866, was reported to have reached 8 feet. He told questioners that his sister, who died in youth, had been a foot taller.

In 1871 Captain Martin Van Buren (or Bates), a Kenutcky veteran of the Civil War, and Miss Anna Swan, the Nova Scotia gianless, were married in London. He was three inches shorter than his 7-foot-5½-inch bride.

The Russian Machnow, who was hailed in the early part of the present century as the tallest man in history, was reputed to be 9 feet 3 inches tall, but little credence is given the report by Dr. Harvey Cushing of Harvard, whose work on the pituitary gland and its disorders, published in 1912, remains a classic in the field of giantology.

Dr. Cushing listed as authentic the measurements of giants ranging from 7 feet 5½ inches to 8 feet 5 inches. He found no authoritative evidence of any person ever having approached a 9-foot height.

DIPLOMAT RECEIVED BY HIS MAJESTY

Mr. R. Husrev Gerede, the new Turkish Ambassador, was received by His Majesty the Emperor this morning and, according to diplomatic custom, the Ambassador presented his credentials.

Ambassador Gerede who arrived recently with his family, was formerly a member of the General Staff Office of the Turkish republic. He is a close friend of the President of Turkey, Mr. Kamal Ataurk and he has had a distinguished career in serving his country, having been active since before the World War when he was military attache in Athens. He fought with the Turkish army during the war and was also active in the nationalistic movement. For his efforts in this respect, he was given the family name of Gerede which is the name of the province in Turkey in which he led the nationalistic movement.

He was elected a member of the House of Representatives four times and in 1924 appointed Minister to Hungary where he was stationed for three years. His next post was Minister to Bulgaria following which he was appointed Minister to Iran. In that office he aided in bringing the border dispute between the two countries to a satisfactory settlement. When the King of Iran visited Turkey, he accompanied the king.

Ambassador Gerede holds high decorations of both his and foreign countries, including the Istklal Madalasi, highest Turkish decoration. He and Mrs. Gerede have a son 13 and a daughter 9.

Paths To Nomination For US Presidency Hard

rostrum, and must for the most part pay as he goes, except for those occasions when he accepts honoraria for public audiences. Given a fair income, his technique is to seize or invent a Burning Issue, and then write about it, make speeches about it and thus attain public recognition.

The next step in winning a Presidential nomination is to obtain the concrete support of political organizations in the primaries and State conventions. This is not so easy. Usually the aspirant can have his own State's delegates to the convention if he has made a sufficient spectacle of himself and if there is no other aspirant from the same State. Beyond that, it depends on his own native wit and how much he has to offer.

Campaign Manager

Usually he hires a campaign manager and a press agent. If he owns a newspaper he needs no press agent. He can go to Washington and make statements, which, as every newspaper man knows, are more important because made in Washington, and his own Washington office becomes his press medium. If he has an engaging personality, he can usually find plenty of volunteer workers, some of whom expect to become ambassador to France or Great Britain, and still others of whom ask no reward but a sense of duty done.

Finally, there is the big test—the national convention. We assume our candidate has won pledges of sufficient delegates to give him a showing on the first vote. Presumably, there are half a dozen or more others like himself, each with insufficient votes to win the nomination. What now?

Well, the voting goes on and on until there ensues a deadlock. No one candidate has enough delegates and no one is willing to say "Uncle." Here is the time for real political skullduggery. Our candidate, or his manager, goes into earnest session with another candidate, or his manager. Overtures are made on either side.

Candidate A, let us suppose, has always had secret qualms anyhow about his ability to hold down the Presidency with credit, but would like to ornament the office of Attorney General. Or maybe he would prefer to be Secretary of State and hold a sensitive finger on the great throbbing pulse of world affairs. Perhaps—for the incredible has happened—he would not mind being Vice President, with a good salary, few duties and a lot of dining out.

Deal Arranged

A deal is arranged. Candidate A, for a consideration, releases his delegates to Candidate B, for whom they have no love at all, but for whom they are willing to vote in order to get it over with and go home. This doubles Candidate B's strength on the next ballot, and, we will suppose, gives him more votes than any one else present, though not enough to nominate.

Here the banners come in handy. Delegates pour from their seats, banners aloft, and march around and around the hall, while the band plays. Sour-faced delegates of other candidates sit and stare, but presently their feet begin to beat time to the music, and one delegation at a time falls into line, after casting its vote in despair for Candidate B.

Enough of this business of follow-the-leader and Candidate B becomes a great leader of the people, a party standard bearer, and a paragraph in Who's Who as long as he lives.

Candidates C, D, E, F, et al., are probably pretty sore about the proceeding, but they take it neatly on the chin, and go out on the road, at the expense of the party's national committee, loyally supporting their triumphant rival. If he wins he takes them into the Cabinet, unless he is a rank ingrate and prefers administrative efficiency to political loyalty.

That is, he takes them into the Cabinet if he wins the election, but that is another story.

Egypt Reported Ready To Knock At League Door

Cairo Negotiators Voted Funds For Parley With London

Egypt's candidature for membership in the League of Nations seems imminent now that Anglo-Egyptian relations have passed into the stage of peaceful negotiations. A fund has been authorized at Cairo to pay the expenses incident to the proposed treaty of alliance between Britain and Egypt. The main points to be considered are the military clauses in the 1933 draft and the question of Egypt's rights in the Sudan. Certainly when that treaty is out of the way—or sooner—the Egyptian Government will press its claims to League membership, according to the Christian Science Monitor.

It is difficult to see how such an application properly sponsored could be refused. The example of Ethiopia—which is admittedly backward if not barbaric—and yet is accepted on an equality in the League, would render impossible the refusal of Egypt, whose civilization ranks among the oldest in the world. Certainly Egypt has experienced vicissitudes, but there can be no discussion as to its worthiness, according to the standards of the League, for membership.

Standing Invitation

If the negotiations which are pursued between Cairo and London are successful, it is certain that Egypt will be received into the League. Its qualifications cannot be questioned.

The League aims at universality, and cannot exclude any country which desires and fulfills the conditions of membership. Indeed the only countries which remain outside the League do so of their own volition, and have a standing invitation to join.

The sovereignty and the independence of Egypt have been recognized by Great Britain. But it is precisely for this reason that doubts have been entertained as to the desirability of Egypt's entry into the League. Once it became a member, it would be able to appeal to the League against Great Britain, and unless an understanding is reached beforehand Great Britain may find itself in the invidious position of being arraigned, before the bar of the Council whenever the most trivial dispute arises.

Accord Expected

It was never intended to make the League Council an instrument of irritation and perpetual propaganda which may conceivably be hostile. Therefore it is simpler to come to an accord before the admission of Egypt.

The fundamental fact is that Egypt has just as vital an interest in establishing good relations with Britain as Britain with Egypt. Even though the Britain were prepared to withdraw their troops—which they cannot do without sufficient guarantees—the Egyptians, whatever it may suit an irresponsible opposition to say, could not accept such withdrawal. Egypt and the Suez Canal would be at the mercy of another power.

There is no incompatibility of British and Egyptian interests, and it is confidently expected that with tact and good will on both sides, the Anglo-Egyptian problem can be solved at an early date.

When sanctions were applied against Italy, Egypt was asked to come into line. Obviously, if it, as an independent country, is invited to co-operate with the League, despite the not negligible possibility of war as a consequence, it must ultimately be allowed full membership.

But first the situation of Egypt vis-a-vis Great Britain must be settled. It would be regrettable were Egyptian desire for membership made the excuse for maneuvers, within the League itself, against Great Britain.

Nye Inquisition Ends; Board Lists Findings

charged with such sinister influence on European politics. But it went extensively back into the World War years and uncovered some remarkable profits made on allied war contracts until the time J. P. Morgan & Co. was charged by allies with the task of consolidating their American purchases.

Involved in this wartime investigation, were several members of the du Pont family as well as Mr. Morgan himself, and numerous of his business associates. Out of this phase of the study, the committee came to the conclusion that American industry's expanding financial stake in the allies' victory was a compelling motive behind American entrance into the war—a conclusion vigorously contested by Mr. Morgan.

No Detail Missed

Dissecting the industry layer by layer, the committee moved down from the great steel and explosives manufacturers to the firms which fabricate the smaller weapons—machine guns, rifles, pistols: then to the wholesalers, the dealers in second-hand or obsolete materials and the men who make a business of salvaging scrap army supplies, including the reconditioning of machine guns.

Finally, they turned their spotlight to where the jobbers operate. These jobbers admitted acting as agents for illegal sales to revolutionists and possible connections with bootleggers were suggested by some of the evidence. But beyond that point the veil of secrecy could not be pierced. Deals are made "confidentially" and "don't ask questions."

As a side line the committee went into the business promotion methods of American airplane salesmen in foreign countries, discovering that "graft," "grease" and "squeeze money" constitute important elements in the business.

Hitler Exhorts Reich To Regain Lost Colonies

plications and of reinforcements to hostile camps which the threat of action entails. There remains on the Nazi program the question of return, as mandated territories or otherwise, of pre-war colonies.

The Nazis, in concentrating their attention on colonial issues, appear to be on somewhat safer ground. The campaign for colonies is popular—it stirs the German blood— and offers the advantage of not involving the breaking of international windows; although perhaps it rattles a few. Questions are asked on the floor of the House of Commons, it is true, but that is about as far as it goes. Great Britain knows and France knows that Nazi Germany does not intend, in fact is not in a position, to attempt to take the coveted colonies by force.

Leaves Seas to Others

For the near future, at least, Reichsfuehrer Hitler resigned himself to leaving the high seas to others when he agreed to a naval pact, in which German naval tonnage is limited to 35 per cent of the British. Of course, there is a certain danger from the Nazi viewpoint in the possibility that the German people may become enthusiastic over the colonial issue only to be disillusioned. In succession the governments of the great colonial nations have signified their refusal to consider parting, for the benefit of the "have nots," with any of their respective colonies or mandated territories.

Recently, in reply to a question on the floor of the House of Commons, J. H. Thomas was especially explicit in indicating that Great Britain had no thought of giving up even a small share of the mandated territories. Incidentally the bulk of the former German colonial possessions are administered under a mandate either by Great Britain or France. Consideration of all these factors would appear to indicate that, barring unforeseen developments, Nazi Germany is destined to remain in the category of the "have nots" for some time to come.

Kimball Named NY Weatherman; Aide to Sea Fliers

Have Been Helpful To Lindbergh, Miss Earhart In Flights Over Atlantic

Appointment of Dr. James H. Kimball, recognized authority on weather conditions over the North Atlantic air routes, as principal meteorologist and official in charge of the New York City Weather Bureau Station, was announced recently by W. R. Gregg chief of the U. S. weather bureau.

He succeeds the late James H. Scarr.

Dr. Kimball has been associated with the weather bureau for 39 years, and since 1915 served as a special assistant to Mr. Scarr in New York. Dr. Kimball has provided weather information for all aviators who have flown or attempted to fly the Atlantic Ocean over the northern route.

When the Lindberghs became a family without a country, Dr. James H. Kimball did them another service, as he has done so often in the past. They were setting out over seas which everyone expected would be stormy, considering the time of year. And so, though before when he has served them it has been in pleasanter circumstances, he bent over his charts in the U. S. Weather Bureau high above Battery Place in New York, and plotted the course of their weather to Ireland.

Dr. Kimball is a quiet, soft spoken man, with a comfortable little portliness of build, appraising blue eyes, and an air of quiet zest for the things of interest taking place in the world. He is a kind of permanent godfather to that small aristocracy of the daring to whom it has been given to lift the thoughts of mankind from the prosaic round of existence.

Aid to Aviators

Lindbergh, Earhart, Balchen, Byrd, Hawks, that great German-Irish trio Hunnefeld, Koehl and Fitzmaurice, Floyd Bennett, the Mollisons, Ruth Nichols, Yancey—all those who have dared the air for the small measure of individual glory, but the far greater measure of service to aviation and the progress of civilization, have looked to him for advice and direction.

When he has said "Wait," they have waited, because they knew that he would know best. When he has said "Go," they have gone, their wings cleaving the air, their thoughts secure in the knowledge of his counsel.

Dr. Kimball was born in Detroit in 1874. He went to Michigan Agricultural College, the University of Michigan, took his M. A., at the University of Richmond, and his Ph.D. at U. S. Weather Bureau in 1895, and he has worked in all sections of the United States and at many posts in the West Indies ever since. In 1917-18 he was meteorological adviser at New York for the French High Commission and instructor for flying units, and in 1927 he became a faculty instructor at New York University on aeronautical meterology.

You would scarcely notice him in a crowd, for he is a shy, self-effacing man. But when any of his aviators fly home he is very apt to be somewhere about, standing quietly in the crowd, watching, with respect, and admiration, and a grave kind of joy.

Big Moments Recalled

The night Lindbergh, landed in Paris he remembers well.

The day the Lindberghs set off for Ottawa on the first leg of their North to the Orient flight Anne Lindbergh had his last-minute advices in her pocket, and her radio would bring her more.

The night Miss Earhart took off, from the dried bed of a Mexican lake, flew up through the deep south and straight as an eagle to Newark Airport, she was flying by the familiar meterological counsels of Dr. Kimball. And when her scarlet ship swung through the star-studded black velvet of the night over the airport, Dr. Kimball was standing in the press of people near the National Guard hangar, smiling quietly to himself over another Grade A performance.

A few minutes later it was this correspondent's privilege to pluck him out of the howling mob, steer him somehow into a car and watch his astonished expression as the car fell in behind Miss Earhart's and rushed pell mell to New York through the tunnel.

Prepared First Air Map

He prepared the first North Atlantic weather maps explicitly for transatlantic flying, and has been official consulting meterologist to each one of the transoceanic fliers since. A year ago they all got together and gave him a dinner in New York. Each one tried to tell what he had done to guide them. But as he didn't think he had done anything much, and they couldn't find the words to express their feelings, everyone got pretty embarrassed.

He is a member of the Ligue Internationale d'Honneur des Aviateurs, of the Order of Polonia Restituta and a Chevalier of the Legion d'Honneur. Not long ago the City of New York gave him its gold medal and a Scroll of Honor for his services to his time in meteorology.

James Kimball has been in the weather business a long time, and you couldn't trade him a gold mine visibly bursting with gold for it.

GOOLD TO RETIRE

The Standard-Vacuum Oil Company has announced the retirement on July 1st, 1936 of Mr. John C. Goold, general manager for Japan, Korea and Formosa. In making this announcement the directors of Standard-Vaccum have coupled with it expressions of high appreciation of Mr. Goold's long and valuable service to the Company.

Mr. Goold has devoted 34 years in the service of Standard Oil, having joined the firm in New York in August 1902 at the age of 16. Nineteen years of service have been spent in Japan. He came to this country in 1908 and after a period of seven years returned to New York for duty at 26 Broadway, the headquarters of his firm; remained there for eight years and in December 1923 returned to Japan as assistant general manager. In 1928 he was appointed general manager. On return to Japan in 1923 he and Mrs. Goold took up residence in Kobe, where the general management of his firm were located following the 1923 earthquake. In 1928 the head office and residences of the company having been completed in Yokohama, Mr. Goold was relocated in that city.

In April last year Mr. and Mrs Goold left for America, anticipating an absence from Japan of only a few months, but business developments were such as to necessitate Mr. Goold's participating in the work of the New York Office, a situation which has occasioned him to repeatedly postpone his return.

It is not expected that Mr. Goold will return to Japan until after his retirement is effective, but he plans shortly thereafter to pay a visit here for the purpose of settling his personal affairs.

Mr. and Mrs. Goold have many friends both in Tokyo and Yokohama where they were active in the affairs of the Foreign communities. Mr. Goold, aside from his duties to his firm and as Honorary Danish Consul was active in the America-Japan Society, of which he was a member of the Committee; he is also on the Board of Trustees of the American School in Japan.

Mr. C. E. Meyer, who came to Japan in March of last year from Shanghai and who has been in charge of the firm's affairs since Mr. Goold's departure, has been named as his successor.

Britain Expected To Give Up Cyprus

fleet lies at Alexandria and Haifa, about 400 miles away, or from the west, where Greece has pledged to Britain the use of Mirabella and Suda Bays in Crete.

The northernmost island of Patmos is fortified only superficially, its defense having been assigned to near-by Leros. Between Patmos and Leros, however, are several small islands such as Lipsi, where caches of fuel have been made for emergency use by airplanes and submarines if the abandonment of Leros should be made necessary by the debarkation of Turkish troops.

Defenses Strongest at Leros

The Italians have decided to make the Leros archipelago their chief fortress because it has two bottleneck harbors—Porta Lago or Lakki on the west and Santa Maria Panteli on the Turkish side. No matter which harbor is attacked first, it will always be possible to transfer warships outside the enemy's vision within a few minutes under the shelter of the island's backbone of mountains, which are armed with about fifty artillery pieces, mostly of 75 caliber. Lakki, home port of the Italian Dodecanese squadron, is protected by a submarine net and mine field like Malta's.

Early this month about 6,000 men composed the Leros garrison. About ninety pilots and 400 enlisted men are servicing Fiat Caproni seaplanes numbering less than 100, contrary to larger figures reported earlier. Barbed wire is spread around the shores and unidentified vessels are fired upon without warning.

Kalymnos, the next island to the south, has been lightly armed, chiefly because of the hostile attitude of the Greek inhabitants. The defenses include twenty rapid-fire guns of small caliber, which have been placed up to a 1,500-foot height around the central peak on the island, Mount Prophet Elias, and they are intended to supplement Leros's defense on the south and to cope with landing parties. A new radio, telegraph and heliograph station has been built on the same mountain.

Straits Are Protected

Kos, with Stampalia, Karpathos and Rhodes, is the key to the two-way Italian defense of the straits that connect the Aegean Sea with the Mediterranean. The straits between the Dodecanese and Crete and the Dodecanese and the Cyclades would be strategically invaluable should the British, Greek or Turkish fleet attempt to cut off oil and coal shipped directly from Russia and Rumania to Africa, or should the British fleet in Egypt atempt to come to the aid of Turkish landing parties in an attack on Leros.

Cape Kephala, in Southwestern Kos, is one of the heaviest fortified and most strictly guarded military zones in the Aegean.

In the event of war Italy would probably race Britain to occupy Eastern Crete, which has no defenses, and thereafter would attempt to keep the passage between Crete and Greek warships.

Command of the straits is so important to Italy that since Britain consummated the entente in December the uninhabited island of Hyali, lying south of Kos and in a corresponding position in relation to Stampalia, has been fortified by heavy guns.

Italy today could rake British warships with fire in several directions if an attempt were made to stab northward to Leros without first subduing the batteries hidden upon the islets in the quadrilateral formed by Stampalia, Kos, Rhodes and Karpathos.

Rhodes Is Ready Also

Rhodes, largest of the Dodecanese Islands, is strongly fortified in its southwestern part. About 250 artillery pieces, most of which are said not to be of more than 45-millimeter caliber, are hidden along the eastern and western sides of the island's central mountain ridge. The entire southern half of the island is belted with barbed wire entanglements 100 to 300 feet from the shore line.

A warm reception awaits any landing party. The twenty-five thousand men garrisoned on Rhodes can be transfered to the most distant part of the island in three hours over excellent new roads. Seaplane and destroyer patrols are Leros.

Record Unemployment

Domei

BERNE.—Swiss unemployment reached the highest level in the history of the country on December 31, according to official figures now published.

On that date, 118,775 people were registered as seeking work, against 95,740 the month before. In 1934, the figures were 110,283 for December, and 91,196 for November.

The hardest hit of all trades was the building industry. Fortysix per cent of the total number of those seeking work belonged to it.

Liner's Kitchen Ruled By 'Mechanical Molly'

While the exclusively masculine navigating bridge of the new Cunard White Star liner Queen Mary boasts its "Iron Mike," latest gyroscopic steering apparatus, the immense kitchens that correspond to woman's domain will have equaly spectacular labor-saving devices, such as the new "Mechanical Molly."

This automatic maid-of-all-work can wash, rinse, polish and sterilize thousands of dishes in an hour. It is guaranteed never to smash the most delicate china, says the Christian Science Monitor. Dishes, glasse and silverware are simply put on a moving belt at one side—and out they come on the other side, scrupulously clean. There are a thousand other touches of home-making perfection embodied in the new liner—many of them contributed by the army of women artists, designers and housekeeping experts who have worked on detailed plans for the ship.

'Warship' For Prince

Domei

PARIS—A Miniature warship, perfect in every detail, has been presented to Prince Michael, the 14-year-old heir to the throne of Rumania, by a group of French admirers.

The model floats and can even fire its guns.

Prince Michael will see it for the first time when he returns to Bucharest from his present holiday in Switzerland with his mother, Princess Helen.

The warship is a replica of the Dunkirk, France's newest warship, and it has taken six months to make it. Prince Michael will use it for maneuvers in the gold-fish ponds of the Sinaia Palace.

Japanese Professors Welcomed In Berlin

Domei

BERLIN, March 20—A lecture on "the Conceptions of Community in Japanese Legal Life" was delivered in excellent German this afternoon at the Kaiser Wilhelm Scientific Society here by Dr. Hideharu Sonda, Professor of Kyoto Imperial University of Japan, before a large number of German jurists and leading social and political personalities.

Professor Sonda recently arrived to assume the presidency of the Japanese Institute here in succession to Professor Takahiko Tomosada of the Tokyo College of Literature and Science.

Criticizing the Roman Law which, it was pointed out, does not coincide with the Japanese in conceptions of proprietorship, Professor Sonda said, "They do not know free, unlimited ownership in Japan."

The Japanese jurist then proceeded to compare the German Law with that of Japan and also emphasized the contribution rendered by the French jurist Professor Prosper-Benjamin Boissonnade to the composition of the Japanese civil law.

Berlin welcomed two other Japanese savants today. They were Professors Hikotaro Nishi and Iwao Kokusho of the Kyoto University. It is reported that a reception has been arranged under the auspices of Leipzig University, where the Japanese professors are expected to proceed on May 8.

Western Asia Pact Unifies 4 Powers

tween them 50,000,000 people, joined by the bounds of religion and race cannot, therefore, be ignored.

Credit for rapprochement must certainly be given to Turkey and particularly Mustafa Kemal Ataturk, President of the Turkish Republic. For ten years now Turkish diplomacy has been busy removing long standing causes of friction and estrangement, but more than diplomatic adroitness it was the magnetic personality of Mr. Ataturk which brought these four countries together. He stands out as the living symbol of independent progress for all countries which have been down-trodden in the past.

For the first time in modern history a national hero of a Moslem country has succeeded by force of arms in preserving the independence of his country and inspiring it to embark of its own initiative on a series of reforms which converted it from an effete conglomeration of people into a modern State.

That lead was followed by Iran and Afghanistan in varying degrees and according to local conditions, and under Turkish inspiration reforms are now well under way.

Afghan students are coming to Turkey in increasing numbers while Turkish professors are regularly being engaged for posts in Afghanistan. Only lately a professor from the Istanbul Law School was appointed rector of Kabul University.

24,000,000 In US On Relief Money

National Total Is Higher By 3,000,000 Than In 1934, Revised Estimates Show

As many as 500,000 of the 3,817,781 persons now employed under the administration's $4,880,000,000 work relief program are not relief clients, but persons hired under exemption orders because of the need for skilled workers for certain types of jobs, according to estimates of some technical advisers of Harry L. Hopkins, WPA Administrator, it is said. Other WPA officials put the figure at not more than 250,000.

No specific figures are available, but if these maximum estimates are correct, about one-eighth of those on work relief jobs are not needy persons who would ordinarily receive relief and only about 3,317,000 destitute are actually being aided under the program.

Orders were originally given that up to 10 per cent of those hired under the work program might be skilled non-relief workers, according to a New York Times report of March 2, which continues:

Figures released today by the WPA indicate that Federal, State and local relief contributions increased materially in 1935 as compared with 1934 and that the average number on relief increased. It was already known that the average size of individual relief payments had increased during this period.

Federal Proportoin Increased

Total relief expenditures for 1935 were $1,826,806,008 as compared to $1,476,567,941 in 1934. Federal expenditures increased from 72.1 per cent of the total to 74.2 per cent. The Federal share was $1,360,330,185 in 1935, or about $300,000,000 more than the previous year.

While many States and localities increased their contributions, the percentage of the total which they contributed decreased slightly. New York State did not follow this general trend. It not only increased the State and local contributions to $136,338,032 from $122,436,920 in 1934 but contributed proportionately as much.

Unemployment estimates made by non-official agencies indicated that there was a slight decrease in unemployment between 1934 and 1935, and the fact that relief rolls had increased in size was attributed officially in good part to the fact that an increasing number of unemployed were running out of resources.

The average number of relief cases durnig 1935 was 4,681,828, as compared with 4,324,953 in 1934, and 3,566,842 in 1933. The all-time peak for the number of relief cases cared for was reached in March, 1935, when 5,492,921 were being aided, but this number had been reduced to 3,446,762 in November, 1935.

Rise in Numbers Since 1934

This sharp reduction, however, was accounted for to a considerable extent by the fact that the work relief porgram had become partially operative by November. Revised estimates today indicated htat the portion of the nation's population receiving Federal and local relief aid had actually increased, instead of decreased as previously reported, between January, 1934, and the same month of 1935.

About 14,200,000 persons are receiving a livelihood from the work relief porgram, it has said, and about 10,000,000 or 12,000,000 more are benefiting from local aid. Thus at present about 24,000,000 presons are dependent on relief for a living, as compared with about 21,000,000 in January, 1934.

The average dole benefit increased to $28.13 per family per month in 1935 from $23.02 in 1934, and $17.03 in 1933, the figures showed. The average wage under the work relief program is considerably higher. The highest dole payment on record was made in January, 1935, when the average family received $30.48. The lowest payments in 1935 were recorded during the month of November when an average of $23.90 was paid.

An attempt is being made at work relief headquarters to check up on the differences between the dole and work relief, as well as the progress of th work program. A staff of 304 statisticians is working long hours to keep Mr. Hopkins and other officials of the government informed on these points.

A 1936 Walking Club featured such notables as Governor Smith, Miss Liberty League, Governor Talmadge, the twelve du Ponts, alone Marine Bandsman and General Hagood. The due Ponts carried toy machine guns and Al Smith paused in the center of the stage to exchange his brown derby for a silk hat handed to him by the georgeously appareled Miss Liberty League.

"Mrs. Democratic" and "Mrs. Republican" went on a shopping tour, "Mrs. Republican" a forlorn and shabby little person and "Mrs. Democratic" large and blatant. Longed for an ermine coat and an evening dress, but said she could not buy them because she had no money. "Mrs. Democratic" bought everything in sight.

"But how do you pay for them, dear, on your budget?" asked Mrs. Republican.

"Pay for them? I just charge them," Mrs. Democratic replied airily.

Catholics Discuss Control Of Births

Scientific Advances Point To Sure Rhythmic Method, Alumni Federation Is Told

Recent physiological and biological advances have brought still nearer the development of a rhythm method of birth control that is 100 per cent reliable, Dr. Frederick W. Rice, widely known gynecologist, told more than 400 members of the National Catholic Alumni Federation recently at a symposium at the Center Club, 120 Central Park South, New York City.

The symposium was on the subject of "Birth Control and Other Marriage Problems." It was the first of a Lenten series to be held during March the federation, which is composed of 12,000 Catholic college graduates, according to the New York Times, whose report continues:

The moral aspects of birth control were discussed by the Rev. Dr. Edward Roberts Moore, head of the social action division of Catholic Charities, and the Rev. Fabian Carey, O. P., Professor of Sociology at the Catholic University of America. Edmond Borgia Butler, chairmen, presided.

After explaining why the present rhythm method is only about 90 per cent successful, Dr. Rice said that what is necessary now is further study of the problem based on analyses of a large number of carefully kept individual records.

"Neither Ogino nor Knaus nor any other advocate of the rhythm theory," he said, "has presented sufficient clinical evidence to substantiate their claims. Once this has been done on a sufficiently large scale it should be fairly easy for biologists, physiologists and anatomists interested in the problem to arrive at some accurate conclusions based upon scientific facts and sound clinical evidence."

Clergy Are Asked to Aid

The cooperation of the laity in securing this evidence is necessary, he added. He also gave it as his opinion that most of this evidence would come from Catholic men and women under the supervision of Catholic physicians.

Dr. Rice, in addition, said he was convinced of the need of "some immediate plan which will enable Catholic men and women to obtain medical information and sound advice on this serious family problem."

"How this task can be accomplished," he continued, "I am not prepared to state. I can only suggest that the further extension and development of the Federation of Catholic Medical Guilds, working through catholic hospitals, would be an essential factor.

"It would be necessary to have the assistance of organizations of Catholic women in order to secure a sufficient number of records of the cycle in normal women. Lack of thorough knowledge of these physiological facts has delayed progress in the practical application of this theory. We shall need the cooperation of the clergy, with their understanding of the nature of family problems, as well as of other groups of laymen in organizations such as the National Catholic Alumni Federation."

Encyclicals Are Quoted

Dr. Moore quoted from papal encyclicals to prove his thesis that contraception is a grave sin because it violates the natural law. But the church's teaching in this respect, he said, does not mean that Catholics are required to have as many children as possible.

"Canon law recognizes a secondary end to marriage," he said, "that of mutual love and assistance. It requires only that the primary end, which is the procreation of children, never be excluded nor means taken to prevent the natural consequences of the marriage act from ensuing.

"It is this positive interference with the normal processes of nature that constitutes birth control, or more occurately birth prevention, as condemned by the church."

The establishment by wealthy Catholics of more maternity hospitals such as the Lewis Hospital in Chicago was urged by Father Carey as a great means to reduce the expenses of childbearing for families with low incomes.

Heidelberg Drops Its Bids To British

As Some Universities Decline Invitations To Anniversary It Cancels Remainder

The Nazi government struck back at the Universities of Oxford, Cambridge and Birmingham on March 2 when the rector of Heidelberg University formally withdrew its invitations to all British universities or academies to send delegates to the ceremonies marking the 550th anniversary of the university's foundation.

This effort to save face had, as a matter of fact, become inevitable after the two leading British universities declined and it became evident that other British institutions could be expected to follow suit, says the New York Times. The dispatch from Heidelberg to the Journal continues:

The step was taken after representatives of the Nazi Minister of Culture, Dr. Bernhard Rust, spent the week-end consulting with the rector and his associates.

It had been rumored here that Joachim von Ribbentrop, Adolf Hitler's special envoy, would try to use diplomatic persuasion to have the decision of the British universities reversed, but nothing seems to have come of this project. Considerable care was taken to try to keep secret the presence of government spokesmen here during the last few days, but it became generally known.

The letter sent to all British recipients of the invitation by Professor Wilhelm Groh, rector of Heidelberg, reads:

"I gather from reports in the British press that the academic character of Heidelberg University's invitation to its 550th anniversary celebration has, to our regret, been publicly confused by a number of prominent Britons with political views, and that the invitation thereby has been divested of its true character. Public opinion appears to me to have been influenced in a manner making it difficult for an Englishman to accept the invitation extended in a friendly spirit. In order to spare those learned men from being placed in a dilemma by this development, I have taken a probably unprecedented decision. I, therefore, herewith withdraw my invitation to the British universities and academic societies."

Discussion of the invitation in Britain took place largely in letters to the editor of The Times of London. Attention was called to the habit National Socialist leaders have acquired of using such anniversaries as occasions for propaganda and also to the wholesale changes made in the Heidelberg faculty since the present regime came into office. Doubt was expressed whether Heidelberg could find very much to celebrate in its present standing as an institution of learning.

Harvard to Send Delegate

Harvard University will send a delegate to the 550th anniversary of the founding of the University of Heidelberg, it was made known in Cambridge, Mass., on March 2 with an announcement of acceptance of the invitation extended by the German university.

"The president and fellows, in accepting the invitation of the University of Heidelberg, recognize the ancient ties by which the universities of the world are united and which are independent of the political conditions existing in any country at any particular time," said the statement.

Harvard has included German universities in extending its invitations to institutions of higher learning in all parts of the world to send delegates to its tercentenary celebration next September.

Harvard's attitude of strong disapproval of the action of the present regime in Germany in respect to academic freedom has already been made clear in a letter of President James Bryant Conant to Dr. Ernst F. S. Hansfstaengl, Hitler aid. It was pointed out by the spokesman, who said that the acceptance of the invitation did not mean any change in Harvard's attitude toward Nazi policies.

Cornell Also Accepts

President Livingston Farrand of Cornell University on March 2 confirmed reports that he had accepted the invitation of Heidelberg University to send a delegate to the celebration of the 550th anniversary of the founding of the German institution.

He appointed Professor A. W. Boesche of the German Department and J. Bennett Nolan of Reading, Pa., a Cornell alumnus, to represent the university at the celebration. Dr. Farrand said he did not regard an exchange of courtesies between two institutions of learning as involving an expression of judgment as to the policies of the present regime in Germany or as to the attitude of the German Government toward the universities of that country.

Yale Undecided

Yale officials said on March 2 that no action had been taken on Heidelberg University's invitation and that none was likely for several weeks.

Columbia Students Opposed

By a vote of four to three, the Columbia College Student Board adopted a resolution on March 1 urging President Nicholas Murray Butler to withdraw his acceptance of an invitation to attend the anniversary ceremonies of Heidelberg University.

Roger E. Chase, editor of The Spectator, undergraduate newspaper, announced that fourteen members of the faculty had indicated that they were opposed to the university's sending a delegate to Heidelberg and that more than 150 students had signed a petition to the same effect.

Social and Personal Notes

About half a century ago, grand balls were held at the Rokumeikan club in Tokyo. Eminent statesmen, their wives, and members of the diplomatic corps attended. European manners and customs prevailed and the women were gorgeously gowned in the height of French fashions. Twenty evening dresses worn at these balls are now on display in the Kanebo store on the Ginza, having been lent for the occasion by Marchioness Hachisuka. The picture shows part of the exhibit being admired.

(The Rokumeikan club which gave its name to the period, is the predecessor of the present Peer's club. The club building is now used for other purposes. It is the building set back from the black gate which is passed on the way to the Imperial hotel from Saiwaicho. The gate itself is now a national treasure.)

Farley Attacks Relief Plan Foes

He Tells New Hampshire Democrats New Deal Policy Saved New England From Crisis

Postmaster General James A. Farley asserted that the American people repealed the economy plank in the 1932 Democratic platform after President Roosevelt had carried out his word to enact it in law, on March 2 at Manchester, N. H.

Mr. Farley said the Economy Bill, passed in 1933, cutting "normal expenditures of government by 25 per cent," was erased from the statute books in 1934 "over the veto of President Roosevelt."

"The members of Congress who overrode that veto came before the voters of the country in the Fall of that year and most of them were re-elected and vindicated by the voters," he said.

Speaking as chairman of the Democratic National Committee, he told the Young Democratic clubs of New Hampshire that the sudden halt of emergency expenditures demanded by administration critics would mean "economic suicide for New England," according to the New York Times. His address was broadcast.

The party chairman's appearance marked a drive to elect a Roosevelt-pledged slate of delegates from New Hampshire to the National Convention.

"The upward swing in business and industry is a direct result of New Deal policies," Mr. Farley said.

Liberty League Assailed

Federal relief money, he contended, "is the measure between good times and desperate times in New England."

"The fact is President Roosevelt is now accomplishing one of the most vital acts of statesmanship in recent political history," Mr. Farley said. "He is carefuly protecting the nation's credit, sponsoring policies to revive industry, and at the same time carrying out the moral obligation to care for the unemployed who are unable to care for themselves."

Mr. Farley turned a moment to what he called "the now discredited" American Liberty League, which he said was "about one part Democratic to seventeen parts Republicans."

The League, he said, warned that the nation was going to ruin because the President had failed to cut government expenses by 25 per cent, but among guests at a recent League dinner in Washington, he asserted, were Representatives Rogers and Martin of Massachusetts "and a number of other Republicans from other parts of the country who voted to destroy the Economy Bill.

"We pass now to the major plank in the platform of those who disagree with us on the methods now being pursued to promote recovery. We are willing to meet any group or any political party on that issue."

Asking what effect a 25-per-cent cut in government expenses might have on New England, Mr. Farley said that substantial cuts cannot be made in the Treasury, Justice or Postoffice Departments, and Congress has refused to cut salaries and veterans' compensation.

As a result, he said, one method of reducing expenses would "slash to the bone the program for building up the navy to the strength it should have. To cut the naval expenditures would hit New England harder than any other section of the country, he said, adding that more than $20,000,000 in public works money has been spent or is being spent in the shipyards of Massachusetts alone.

Reviews Roosevelt Work

In his speech Mr. Farley also said: "It is my privilege, as chairman of the Democratic National Committee, to report to you good people on the work of our party in power. President Roosevelt pledged himself, if elected, to promote recovery, to check deflation and to save the great mass of the American people from losing their homes, their savings and their jobs. He carried out that task in magnificent fashion and with justified pride we place his record before the voters of the nation.

"President Roosevelt is now under attack because some one made the pretended discovery that he failed to carry out a plank in the Democratic platform which pledged a 25 per cent reduction in the ordinary running expenses of the Federal Government. He is being held up to scorn as a man who failed to keep his promises and who ignored the platform on which he was elected.

"I challenge the accuracy of that statement."

Referring to relief expenditures, he said:

"After the long strain of the depression, the merchants in this section of the country are making money again and their books have passed out of the red and into the black. The retailers, the storekeepers, the butchers, the bakers, the doctors and the dentists who go to make up the great middle class are tasting good times again because the people have money to spend and can pay their bills.

"The merchants are able to pay for advertising and thus keep the newspapers going. The white-collar workers have jobs and are able to support themselves and their families. Withdraw the emergency relief money now being sent into New England by Uncle Sam, and I say it would be the most cruel blow that could be struck against the great mass of people.

Prison Preferred

Four years hard labor—for stealing two chickens—is the sentence that has been passed on a woman by the Alexandria Assizes.

But instead of protesting, the woman has begged that her sentence shall be made longer.

She is Sayeda Ibrahim, and she has explained to the judge that she prefers prison life to the outside world.

In prison, she said, she was sure of a bed and food. Outside she was unable to earn a living.

5-Year Divorce Plan Is Offered

M.P.-Humorist Says If Couple Aren't Compatible By That Time They Never Will Be

The reformation of marriage, divorce, drinking and betting customs of England has been seriously proposed in Parliament by that versatile man of letters and politics, A. P. Herbert, known to the readers of "Punch" as "A. P. H." and to fellow statesmen as "A. P. H. M. P."

Herbert's five-year plan for divorce has attracted considerable attention. Under his proposed amendments to divorce law no decree would be granted until the marriage had been in existence for at least five years. Herbert himself, married twenty-one years and the father of four children, thinks that many "rocky" marriages might survive if prolonged past the dangerous first four years, says Joseph Driscoll in the New York Herald Tribune. His article of Feb. 15 continues: On the other hand, he figures if people do not like each other in five years, they never will.

After five years, divorce could be obtainable on the grounds of adultery, desertion lasting three years, cruelty, incurable insanity, incurable habitual drunkenness or imprisonment for aterm or a communted death sentence. At present the only grounds for divorce are adultery and, in rare cases, cruelty and desertion. Thus Herbert would widen the grounds for divorce as well as lengthen marriages. Being opposed to hasty marriages as well as hasty divorces, he offers a three-to-six-month marriage plan as follows:

No marriage to be allowed unless—

Three months notice has been given of the publication of the banns or of the application for a license or a certificate; or,

Six months notice of the engagement has been given to the registrar or in a daily newspaper, or,

A special license has been granted by the Archbishop of Canterbury or the courts have authorized the marriage on the grounds of special urgency.

Although happily married himself, Herbert is regarded as an authority on divorce since the publication of his "Holy Deadlock," in wheih he exposed the racket by which English divorce seekers hire professional co-respondents a la New York. His bill has the backing of members drawn from all parties, including Eleanor Rathbone, who is a spinster; Colonel Josiah Wedgwood, a bachelor, and Sir Francis Acland, Robert Boothby, Aneurin Bevan, Sir Arnold Wilson, Ernest Thurtle and F. Seymour Cocks—all married from two to thirty years.

Herbert's betting bill legalizes and licenses cash betting along the lines of the recommendations of the Royal Commission. At present it is illegal to place a cash bet with a bookmaker, but permissible to establish a credit account with amblin agencies which advertise their wares unashamedly.

Herbert combines his literary skill with a crusading fervor in his drinks bill, which reads:

"Whereas, it appears that the laws concerning public refreshment are vexatious and unreasonable and are not well fitted to the odd sense of Englishmen and the conditions of the present time; and

"Whereas, the said laws as at present administered are a hindrance to the improvement in the resorts of the people, the cause of intemperance, a burden on trade, a danger to the King's revenue and a discouragement to foreign travelers proposing to visit this realm; and

"Whereas, it is commonly accepted that England is now to be considered as a part of the Continent of Europe and should so conduct herself in all proper and peaceful affairs, and in this affair it is expedient that she should follow the good and civilzed customs of France;

"Be it therefore enacted that . . . the laws of England concerning the provision of public refreshment, including the sale or supply of wine, beer, spirits and the like, shall be made, mutatis mutandis, the same as the laws of France."

Americans and other "foreign travelers," who have been irritated by the early closing hours of the pubs and restaurants, by a shotrage of comfortable accommodations and by conflicting regulations, will be inclined to say "Amen" to the improvements suggested by Herbert, who, in addition to being an independent member for Oxford University, is a member of The Black Lion and Skittles Club.

Franco-Soviet Treaty Attributed Nazi Blunder

ed by every chancellory in Europe regarding the Nazi plans of aggression as Berlin's refusal to join in this scheme for organizing peace in the Baltic.

Still unrepudiated stands the famous passage in Hitler's autobiography, "Mein Kampf," in which Der Fuehrer wrote: "We National Socialists have deliberately drawn a line through the pre-war tendency of our foreign policy. We stem the Germanic stream toward the south and west of Europe and turn our eyes eastward. We have finished with the pre-war policy of colonies and trade and are going over to the land policy of the future. Fate itself seems to wish to give us our direction."

Predicted Soviet Collapse

"When fate abandoned Russia to bolshevism it robbed the Russian people of an educated class which once credited and guaranteed their existence as a state. The Germanic element may now be regarded as entirely wiped out in Russia. The Jew has taken its place. The immense empire will one day collapse."

Can it be that the violent German denunciation of the Franco-Soviet pact was inspired by the realization of the fact that this treaty bars the way to Nazi expansion in the east? But whatever else it does, this pact destroys definitely all chances of a Franco-German rapprochement as long as Hitler remains Chancellor. The Third Republic has chosen to seek security in a system of collective security rather than by buying immunity from the Nazi aggression at a price and disinteresting itself in the fate of the rest of Europe. Der Fuehrer will never forgive this.

For the moment perhaps, for reasons of expediency, he will not denounce the Locarno treaty, but the ratification of the Franco-Soviet pact none the less will drive the last nail in the coffin of the Briand-Stresemann policy of conciliation between two historic foes.

—HOKUSEIDO'S NEW BOOK—
JAPAN'S FOREIGN RELATIONS
1542-1936
A SHORT HISTORY
by Roy Hidemichi Akagi, Ph.D.,
Formerly Visiting Lecturer on Japanese Affairs, Columbia University
Handsomely bound in buckram, 9¼×6½" 560 pages, with illustrations
Price 7.00 Postage 22 sen in Japan
This is the first book which gives in English a complete survey of Japan's foreign relations. It is an attempt to summarize in one handy volume the main acts and scenes in the unfolding drama of Japan's foreign relations during the past four hundred years, from her first contact with Western Powers to the recent Sino-Japanese crisis in Manchuria and its aftermath. In it is found the marvellous story of achievements, unparalleled in world history, of Japan's rise from a hermit kingdom in the Far East to a great world Power; two centuries of continuous but unsuccessful attempts by Western Powers to force open Japan's closed doors; the re-introduction of Japan to world intercourse, and the struggle to free herself from the yoke of unequal treaties; Japan's bid for world recognition through the Sino-Japanese War, the Anglo-Japanese Alliance, the Russo-Japanese War, and the World War; development of Japan's Far Eastern policy, culminating in the annexation of Korea, the "Twenty-one Demands," and the acquisition of extensive rights in Manchuria; the re-orientation of Japan's foreign policy through the Washington Conference, the "Shidehara Policy" vis-a-vis China, the League of Nations, and the Pact of Paris; the Sino-Japanese crisis of 1931-33, Japan's eventual withdrawal from the League of Nations, the advent of the "New Deal" in Japanese diplomacy, and her withdrawal from the London naval parley. It is truly "a short history" which utilizes the cream of latest scholarly researches and brings the kaleidoscopic events in Japan's past foreign relations within the grasp of all who desire to understand the background of Japan's diplomacy to-day.

Farmer Thaws Ducks

Domei

NEWARK, Ohio.—Walking around his farmyard George Neil found two of his ducks frozen in the pond.

He tried to chop them free with a hatchet, but failed. Then he got a saw, sawed off a section of the ice containing the ducks and took the whole piece into the farm kitchen, where he melted the ice on the floor, releasing the ducks.

The latter required the attention of the "vet" but, the farmer reports, are "getting on as well as can be expected."

Dismissal Of Hagood From US Army Criticized

eral might not have been entirely to blame for his remarks, or, rather, that he did not enter so voluntarily upon a criticism of the WPA as the face of the record indicated.

Byrnes's Charge

The charge was made by Senator Byrnes, representating General Hagood's home State, that the officer was led into his remarks by questions from Representative Blanton of Texas; furthermore, that Mr. Blanton, misusing his prerogative to revise his remarks, deleted the leading questions he propounded to the general, thereby making the printed record show that General Hagood had made what amounted to a "stump speech" against the administration.

The testimony was given on Dec. 17, 1935. It was not made public until Feb. 10, 1936, when the War Department Appropriations Bill was reported formally to the House. Members of the subcommittee who heard the general in person said that some even "hotter" stuff was deleted before the record was printed.

Such as remained, however, was not enough for the administration. Heading accounts of the general's remarks in the newspapers, Harry L. Hopkins, Works Progress Administrator, complained to the War Department. The War Department, through Secretary Dern, demanded an explanation from General Hagood. What they got was an acknowledgment by the officer that he was quoted "substantially" correctly.

The matter was taken to the President. It was discussed at length at a Cabinet meeting. Officials talked of a court-martial. Younger and envious army officers thought, "At last, we've got old Hagood."

Not Forgotten

Nothing was done for two weeks. The incident was in the process of being forgotten by the public except by some of the New Deal critics, who were planning to coin the "stage money" remark into a campaign slogan; a few administration officials, who either thought the general should be punished or who felt that the "stage money" slogan would have to be met later in the Presidential campaign, also remembered.

The War Department, faced with the necessity for discipline among service officers and the record of General Hagood, could not and would not forget.

So the lightning struck. General Hagood was stripped of his command. He was sent home to warm his restless feet in Carolina sunshine until Secretary Dern and General Craig might find something to which his particular talents might be adaptable.

The War Department sought to take full responsibility for "pinning back the ears" of the erring general. It made public a memorandum, addresed by Chief of Staff Craig to the Secretary of War as early as Feb. 18, suggesting that something definite and drastic be done to put a clamp on the garrulous Hagood, who at least three times before had run afoul of army regulations or even articles of war. General Craig suggested something stronger than a reprimand but less than a court-martial, for, as he said, "General Hagood is an officer of high profession and technical attainment, of brilliant intellect and great energy."

'Flippancy' Rebuked

However, said General Craig, this good officer "apparently feels that these endowments entitle him to express himself in a manner that would bring condign consequences on others." He characterized General Hagood's remarks before the subcommittee as "flippant in tone and entirely uncalled for and designed to bring ridicule and contempt upon civil agencies of the government." He denominated them as of a "wise-crack" type.

Unfortunately for the administration in its endeavor to keep the Hagood case strictly within the War Department, this memorandum of General Craig was not made public until the matter had become a virtual political issue. Charges had been made in the House and Senate, by Republicans and Democrats alike, that the department was disciplining the officer, "by direction of the President," because he had dared speak his mind about the WPA and its spending policies. They charged the administration with attempting to spread terrorism among New Deal critics. They overlooked the articles of war and the personnel regulations which the officer obviously had transgressed. Moreover, they apparently paid no attention at all to the fact that the other three corps and department commanders appeared the same day before the same subcommittee and created no such situation.

It is obvious, however, that the department's step in disclosing General Cragi's memorandum did take the edge somewhat off the political issue inherent in the Hagood case.

Precedents Are Cited

However, Republicans and Democrats alike shouted to the heavens. Democratic leaders retorted that the Republicans had committed much worse offenses toward the late Brig. Gen. William Mitchell and former Major Gen. Smedley Butler of the Marine Corps. In the course of the controversy Senator Robinson, the Democratic floor leader, met the charge of "terrorism" with the assertion that another high officer, Major Gen. Frank C. Bolles, commander of the Seventh Corps Area, with headquarters at Omaha, was stretching the barrier imposed upon army personnel against dabbling in politics.

No one yet has questioned the right or the policy of the department in dealing with General Hagood. Some have questioned the expediency, and that alone. Article 62 of the Articles of War, relative to punishment for disrespect toward the President, Vice President, Congress, Secretary of War, Governors and Legislature, apparently carries a distinct rule against what the general did.

Before this immediate case there was the celebrated one of General Mitchell, who was court-martialed and practically driven out of the service because of his criticism of methods and policies within the army itself.

In the navy there was the case of General Butler, marine officer, who was arrested and ordered court-martialed because of a remark made in a speech at Philadelphia regarding the alleged ruthlessness of Premier Mussolini of Italy. The court-martial was canceled when General Butler apologized for the incident to the Secretary of the Navy, but he soon left the service.

In 1927 Rear Admiral Thomas P. Magruder was relieved of his command as commandant of the Philadelphia Navy Yard and ordered before Secrtary of the Navy Wilbur following the publication of a series of articles in which he criticized the administration of the service. He later received another command and continued his career.

Difference Pointed Out

It will be seen that in most of the cases cited above the offense grew out of some activity strictly within the service, which, administration officials insist, were not as bad as that indulged in by General Hagood.

The War Department's course, therefore, would appear on the surface as entirely consistent in the case of General Hagood. From the standpoint of the general administrations as to whether politics did not play an important part in the summary action taken against him. And a still further question which seems to have been answered in part by the reaction against the removal of General Hagood, is whether the administration did not make a tactical blunder in handling the affair.

Roman Aqueduct Discovered

Domei

PARIS—Remains of a Roman aqueduct, one of those which supplied Lugdunum (Lyons) with water, have been brought to light at Vaugneray, some thirteen miles from Lyons.

The stonework was laid bare in the course of widening a road, and is in a perfect state of preservation.

Only ten yards have been uncovered but there is no doubt that excavations would reveal a long stretch of masonry.

The aqueduct was constructed to bring the waters of the Brevenne to the plateau of Fourviere just above Lloys.

The water-mains which distributed the water from the aqueduct to the city of Lugdunum still exist beneath the Fourviere Hill.

Ballantine Hits U.S. Spending As Speculation

Ex-Treasury Aid Likens New Deal Borrowing To That Before '29 Crash

In a sharp attack on the financial policy of the Roosevelt administration, which he described as "virtually a policy of government speculation," Arthur A. Ballantine, former Under Secretary of the Treasury, asserted recently that continued borrowing would mean continued advance toward the breaking point of public credit, inevitably followed by currency inflation "with its disastrous effect upon our whole individual and national life." He spoke at a luncheon forum on public affairs, held in the Columbia University Club, New York City. Dr. H. Parker Willis, professor of banking at Columbia University, presided.

"If our government is ever going to get back to financial health, we must start resolutely about it," Mr. Ballantine said, according to the New York Times. "There will never te a better time. The way is clear: Go over the whole vast expenditure program and reduce it wherever possible, with the same resolution that was shown by this Administration at the outset when it put through the great, but short-lived economy act."

He pointed out that for the fiscal year now being planned, which will begin on July 1, it appeared that the deficit would reach over five billion dollars, and that the total gross deficits for the four years of 1934, 1935, 1936 and 1937 would be close to sixteen billion dollars.

Cites Continued Spending

"Early deficits were caused by the tremendous depresison drop in government revenues," he recalled. "With improved business and increased taxation, revenues have now been restored to a high figure but, nevertheless, the deficits continue.

"If the total for regular expenditures had been held down to the figure for 1934, and receipts maintained the same, the estimated receipts would show an excess of nearly $2,000,000,000, which could be applied to relief."

Discussing "pump priming" as a justification for spending, he said that the argument for it no longer holds good, because continued heavy expenditures by the Federal government "cease to be priming, and become part of industry, making the basis of industrial operations unnatural and uncertain."

Criticizes Bonus Payment

"A vice of the free expenditure policy is that expenditure begets further expenditure," he said. "The ever-present pressure of special groups is increase. No one can doubt that the passage of the recent legislation for the payment of the bonus, which the Treasury can so little afford, was induced by the practice and spectacle of lavish expenditure in other fields."

An inevitable consequence of the policy of free spending is increased taxation, Mr. Ballantine said. The full consequences have so far been postponed because about one-half of the money expended to date has been borrowed money instead of tax money, or in other words a spending "not only of the other fellow's dollar but the dollar of the fellow who is to come."

"In 1929, we learned what could happen to a securities and real estate market built upon borrowed funds which could be quickly called," he warned. "Now we have a vast extended borrowing position of the government itself, resting in a very large measure upon a similar unstable basis."

The result of increased taxation means greater cost of food, clothing and shelter, waste in government expenditures, and paralysis of industry, he said. This in turn means not only diminution of the government's revenues, but the lessening of employment and productivity.

Mr. Ballantine said that there must be recovery of the purpose to operate the government on the basis of expenditures not in excess of revenues, a matter on which the President's budgetary message to Congress "manifested no conviction."

The Imperfect Crime

Absent-mindedness has proved the undoing of a burglar in Cairo.

He broke open a safe containing £200 and got safely away with his swag. But the police had an easy job. The burglar had absentmindedly left his tools behind in a box which bore his name and address!

Annapolis Looks To Cadet Increase

Naval Academy Officials, Expecting Passage of Bill, Plan To Expand Facilities

Naval Academy officials, anticipating the passage of legislation to increase the number of appointments of midshipmen allowed each member of Congress from four to five, are getting ready to take care of the increased number.

The new legislation will bring an entering class this Summer of about 1,100, and raise the student body to about 2,300, according to the New York Times. If the new provisions remain, in a year or two the student body will regularly total between 2,800 and 2,900.

The number of midshipmen reached a peak of just below 2,400 during the World War, when temporary quarters were erected to augment the regular dormitory, and the teaching and administrative force of the academy were increased.

Bancroft Hall, the quarters of the midshipmen, was built to take care of about 1,800 midshipmen. A typical living unit consists of a suite of two sleeping rooms, with a study and bathroom between them, and was intended to be occupied by two midshipmen.

In order to care for the additional midshipmen, it will be necessary to increase the number of occupants of each suite. Beds for one or two are to be placed in the study room. There is no plan at present to enlarge Bancroft Hall, but the matter has been considered. It will be necessary to build additional wings if the student body is largely increased.

Enlargement of Bancroft Hall by the erection of two additional wings has the objection that it would impinge upon the already cramped space which might be termed the "campus" of the Naval Academy.

It is probable that the need for more space will bring about a further enlargement of the grounds by taking in portions of Annapolis. An area of two and a half city blocks which was part of the original plan of the new Naval Academy, has never been acquired, and juts into the present grounds.

Classroom and laboratory facilities at the academy were designed for a smaller number of midshipmen than the regiment which will use them under the new program. Nor is the present teaching and executive staff adequate. An increase in the teaching force, both of civilians and officers, as well as the physical plant of the Naval Academy, is therefore expected.

The Bad Fairy

Belief in fairies has cost Trudl Gross, a 19-year-old peasant girl, 5 marks at Spessardorf, Central Bavaria.

She placed a new five-mark piece on a tree stump deep in the woods on the outskirts of Spessartdorf. This, according to tradition, should be returned five-fold to the owner.

When Trudl looked for her money next morning, she found a 50-mark note in place for her coin. It bore the note "From a Good Spirit."

But her joy has been short-lived. The note is worthless—it is an inflation issue placed there by a practical joker.

Though suffering greatly from lack of food and exposure, the animal

Syrian Strike Laid To Economic Crisis

Failure Of French To Help In Industrial Improvement Is Cause Of Friction

After forty days of striking, and despite all coercive methods of the French to end it, the situation in Syria today is no less chaotic than it was six weeks ago when the strikes began, says Joseph M. Levy in a despatch from Damascus on Feb. 29 to the New York Times. His article continues: Nationalist leaders here are anxious to take all of the credit for the present situation, trying to convince the world that the strike is in support of their demands for a united, independent Syria and the abrogation of the French mandate.

Although it is an exaggeration to say that the Nationalist aspirations of Syrian leaders are not shared by the population, close observation reveals the problem to be far more one of economics rather than politics. The dire economic crisis prevailing in the country is beyond all doubt the main reason for the strong opposition to the French.

During sixteen years of French administration in Syria little has been done to further the development of the country—which is fertile and has great possibilities—agriculturally or industrially. To the contrary Syrians claim that the French in many instances not only are disinterested themselves in promoting new industries and agricultural developments but have even hindered the Syrians who, on their own initiative, have attempted new enterprises.

The most striking case is the story of the American Syrians who invested several hundred thousand dollars, which they made in America, in establishing a tannery to provide a decent livelihood for about 100 families. When the tannery was established, the duty on imported leather was 40 per cent, which allowed local manufacturers greatly to undersell imported goods and still leave a reasonable margin of profit.

French Firms Protested

Upon the complaint of leather firms in France that they were unable to export merchandise to Syria because it was impossible to compete with a local manufacturer, French authorities in Syria suddenly reduced the duty on leather from 40 per cent to 11, resulting in the ruination of the Syrians' tannery enterprise.

Another pertinent instance is the case of a cement factory. About three years ago a Syrian company established a huge cement plant. According to certificates from some of the world's greatest experts, the quality of the cement produced at that factory was equal to the best manufactured anywhere abroad. Yet the Syrians allege that in government building contracts the French authorities insist on cement imported from France—a policy bound to antagonize even the strongest pro-French Syrian.

Another factor in the strong opposition to French administration in Syria is the "cooperative." Any Frenchman in Syria, official or otherwise, buys everything he needs from the cooperative, which is an official institution exclusively for Frenchmen in Syria, importing from France everything from pins to automobiles duty free.

Leading Syrian merchants told the writer that, while hundreds of Frenchmen earned unusually high salaries as officials of the Syrian Government, whose funds are derived entirely from taxes and customs dues paid by the native population, yet the only money the French spend in the country is for vegetables which they are unable to import from France. Even meats are brought from the home country. Fodder for the army animals, which is most plentiful in Syria, is purchased in Morocco.

French Admit Wrong Policy

On the whole, Syrians feel the French administration, instead of helping them develop themselves politically and economically as provided in the League mandate, actually has pauperized the population. Replying to the writer's question why the French have not encouraged natives in fruit-growing, since Syria produces some of the best fruits in the world, leading French officials admitted frankly that it was the wrong policy.

Little wonder, therefore, that extreme Nationalist leaders find ready ears among the masses when they agitate against French rule. The real origin of the present trouble in Syria is purely an economic question. The Belgian company holding the concession for electric power and the trolleys in Damascus refused to reduce the price of electricity or the trolley fares, which Syrians allege are exorbitant, so the latter decided to boycott the company.

French authorities, instead of trying to arbitrate, sided with the company and arrested and exiled Fakhri Bey El Baroudi, the moving spirit of the boycott, who is the sincerest and most respected leader in the country. This kindled the fire. Political leaders seized the opportunity to turn a purely economic controversy into a political issue which fomented into a general strike. Not even the most far-sighted student of Near Eastern affairs is able to predict the outcome of the deplorable situation in this "oldest city in the world."

Subject Of Britain's Sea Defense Is Discussed

which is to be expected under the forthcoming National Defence Bill will be considerably restricted by considerations, not only of finance, but the capacity of our shipbuilding yards. It is to be hoped, however, that no provision for the replacement of our old, but mostly reconstructed and efficient, battleships will be allowed to stand in the way of a large and rapid increase in the number of our cruisers and destroyers.

The number of 50 cruisers, which was reluctantly accepted by the Board of Admiralty in 1930 in view of the special circumstances of the time, is grossly inadequate for the protection of our sea lines of communication and for the scouting requirements of our battle fleet. Even the number of 70 which had been laid down by a previous Board is considered insufficient by many naval officers.

We started the Great War, in which our enemies included only one sea Power of any material importance, and in which the strategical conditions were much in our favour, with 108 cruisers, and this number proved insufficient to hunt down the few and scattered German cruisers until they had taken a heavy toll of British merchant ships and dislocated much of our sea traffic in the distant oceans. Our destroyer strength, although increased during the Great War from 321 (destroyers and torpedo-boats) to 501, was never sufficient from the first day of the War to the last, yet our number at this moment amounts to 169 only.

Greatest Anxiety

It is not easy to conceive under what circumstances in the near future a war at sea will include major operations requiring large and modern battle fleets. It is certain that in any naval war our most serious anxiety will be for the safeguarding of our lengthy and widefling lines of sea communication.

Let us then deal with the greater danger first, and allow the replacement of the battle fleet to wait, at any rate until a minimum number of 70 efficient cruisers and of 250 efficient destroyers has been fully provided for.

I am, &c.,
SYDNEY R. FREMANTLE,
Admiral (Retired).

New Insulin Announced

In connection with the meeting of the American College of Physicians a new insulin which promises to make the lives of sufferers from diabetes more nearly normal was announced by the Department of Internal Medicine of Harper Hospital.

It is a crystalline form, which can be administered at a rate approximating the natural secretion from the pancreas.

It lowers the blood sugar content more gradualy than old insulin, the hospital physicians declared, and maintains the lower content for a longer time. It is also absorbed more slowly and therefore has an action on the body similar to natural insulin.

Experience to date shows that smaller and fewer doses are needed. It was emphasized that it is entirely different from protomine insulin, another new insulin product announced recently.

Hemophilia, mysterious male blood disease in which excessive bleeding results from a small wound or bruise, was declared today probably to be due to an inherited defect in the blood platelets, the small cells which cause coagulation, or clotting.

Dr. I. Lee of Boston declared in a clinic:

"We think we have proved what hemophilia is.

"The chances of life are fairly good for sufferers who reach the age of 21, have good medical care, and can have blood transfusions when necessary."

Hemophilia has been known for centuries as "the curse of royalty"

Dionne Quintuplets Get No Spankings, Declares Dr. Dafoe

Radiating quiet optimism about the present state and the probable future of the Dionne quintuplets, Dr. Allan Roy Dafoe, their physician, arrived in New York recently from Callander, Ont., for a week of rest and relaxation. He said his five famous charges, who have their own hospital and nurses in the little Ontario community, are not being shown to the public during the Winter.

"We have snow up in that country," the doctor said, smiling.

The little girls, Emile, Cecile Marie Yvonne and Annette are well and thriving, he added, and play together like normal children, according to the New York Times. They do not talk clearly as yet but say in French-Canadian baby talk "Bo-jou" and "Au-voi" to visitors they know.

They Behave Well

They behave well, Dr. Dafoe said between puffs of his briar pipe. They get no corporal punishment if they are naughty but are simply "put aside." But in his opinion, they have no reason to be naughty. They are well and thriving.

They sleep outdoors even when the temperature is 30 degrees below zero and eat a normal diet for their age—21 months—of bananas, oranges, vegetables, cereal, soups and milk. They get from a pint and a half to a quart of milk each daily. They play with rag dolls and walk well.

Marie, the smallest, now weighs more than 21 pounds, the doctor said, while Yvonne, the heaviest, tips the scales at more than 24. They are gaining so fast that he would not be surprised, he said, to see them average the normal weight of a single baby—30 to 35 pounds—at 2 years of age, the end of next May.

With their simple diet they really have nothing to give up for Lent, the doctor said, laughingly, in reply to a question in the course of an interview at the Hotel Chatham.

"Their mental progress is normal," he said, "and they are about equal mentally. They will be treated like normal children, but educated, I think, in their own home school. This plan may be changed, however. We are trying to meet the various problems as they arise and cannot plan to far ahead."

Wealth Is Estimated

Asked about the state of the children's finances, he said they were now worth, collectively, about $150,000, but he would not hazard a guess as to what their fortune would be when they are 18 years old.

Regarding his own plans, Dr. Dafoe said they were indefinite for his stay here. He had just come for a rest and change of scene and would probably go to the theater and possibly some night clubs.

Frederick Ferguson, his host, who handles the doctor's syndicated articles, said that they would see the Follies last night and that toward the end of the week he would give a dinner for Dr. Dafoe and some other physicians at the Lotos Club. Mr. Ferguson added that Dr. Dafoe really wanted to rest and would give no more interviews while here.

USSR Plans 'Hollywood' For Her Film Industry

been partly due to primitive working conditions and antiquated equipment as well as to the fact that studios have been located in regions where sunshine is rare, compelling costly expeditions "in search of the sun."

To attain the "Hollywood tempo," the Soviet film industry has obtained appropriations to begin construction immediately of a film city in the south of Russia and also to provide modern technical equipment and organization.

Whether the artistic Soviet films praised by foreign critics can be turned out in quantity is a debatable question. The supremacy of the Russian repertory theater is largely due to the fact that its regisseurs are permitted to spend a year or even two years in recharsal. Hollywood directors, held to fixed production schedules, have discovered that a large proportion of their films can be nothing better than "pot-boilers." It seems probable that Soviet directors will have the same experience.

An Industry

But Mr. Shumiatsky realizes that he is directing an industry, as well as a field of artistic endeavor. He is aware of the fact that appeals for more pictures from frantic theater-managers, which have been numerous enough this past year, will multiply when the number of theaters is quadrupled. The Soviet public is tired of seeing the same pictures again and again. The occasional foreign pictures exhibited attract vast and enthusiastic audiences.

If Hollywood directors feel, hampered by "commercialism," Soviet directors are equally bound by the exacting Marxian formulas which must be applied to every form of public expression in Russia. Every picture must be carefully scrutinized to make sure that it does not offend the latest Kremlin theories. And now, as Mr. Shumiatsky reveals, the Soviet film industry also must begin to observe the rules of "commercialism." It must fix production schedules, and observe them. It must increase output systematically, and cut down expense and waste. Only a fortunate few Soviet directors can hope hereafter to spend unlimited time and expense in making a picture. Hollywood also has its fortunate few.

Sidewalk Artists Bring Color To Old London

service month after month.

The choice spots of London are not by any means the busy parts. One man parks beside a church in the neighborhood of Kensington Gardens and draws his subjects from buildings in the street near by. A church is conspicuous when it is in service, his sense of perspective in drawing being equaled by his judgment in making an appeal to his public.

Some Excellent Work

It is, of course, well known that some of the street artists have won commendations from men in circles of art. One critic even went so far as to say that the exhibition of the works by pavement artists in one of the London Galleries excelled some examples of art which might be found in shops nearby.

It is only on occasion, of course, that originality is expressed. The street artist who extends "New Year Greetings" to the passer-by, or employs his talents upon a member of royalty who at the moment happens to be very much in the public eye is all too common.

Varied Audience

But there is, nevertheless, to be found an occasional artist with an original talent, which seldom fails to win a measure of encouragement. No common public is the pavement artist's audience, for a peer of the realm is as likely to linger by a glow of colorful drawings as the ordinary man-in-the-street.

Whether the street artist makes his pitch in Gloucester Road or Russell Square, or whether he be a youth whose resistance to art will not be downed, or a veteran whose resistance to art will not be downed, or a veteran whose talents are more worthy of a better vocation, there is always a public generous and respectful toward the members of his "profession." Nor are his rights to a particular vocation ever challenged. Street vendors may elbow each other out of a place. The street artist remains secure.

New Deal Survey Sent To President

National Emergency Council Sums Up Results, Putting Farm Aid First

A survey of the United States government's emergency activities went to President Roosevelt on Feb. 29 from the National Emergency Council.

Lyle T. Alverson, acting executive director of the council, wrote the President, in submitting the 50,000-word summary, that it was "intended as a measure of the efficacy and accomplishments of the administration's program for economic recovery and reconstruction," according to the New York Times, whose article continues:

Under ten general heads, the report encircled the whole range of New Deal activities. It took up the administration program as it related to agriculture, labor and industry; fiscal affains, governmental and private; housing, power, transportation, communications, relief and "other activities." Under the last heading were grouped most of the regular departments. In agriculture it said the farmer had a boost of $2,000,000,000 in net income in 1935 over 1932.

As to labor and industry, the survey found the volume of factory manufacturing was about 50 per cent higher in 1935 than in 1933; that factory payrolls jumped about 50 per cent in 1935 but still were about 35 per cent below the 1929 high. Several million workers had been re-employed in industry and agriculture, but the number of unemployed was still large.

Public Debt Interest Cut

The interest rate on the public debt had been cut from 3.4 to 2.5 per cent, a reduction of $242,721,981 in interest charges, the survey set forth, and the total interest bearing public debt had been $20,921,640,520 on March 31, 1933, and $28,617,496,846 on Nov. 30, 1935.

Fewer failures of licensed banks and commercial concerns were reported for 1934 than in 1929 or any succeeding year.

The report set forth that $3,607,197,492 had been spent for relief between the third quarter of 1933 and the end of 1935; 2,078,896 were on relief in 1933 and 3,081,208 at the end of 1935 and $4,247,804,000 had been allotted under the new works fund.

Asked about the possibility that the Democratic National Committee would adapt the report to campaign usage, Eugene Leggitt, executive assistant to Mr. Alverson said:

"The Republican National Committee can have a copy just as well as the Democrats. We have a limited supply to give to anybody who asks for one, and when they are printed anybody can buy it who wants to."

Tables given to show "the degree of success achieved" in an administration efforts to increase the "purchasing power of the agricultural population" listed increases in farm income, after deducting production expenses. These cited the total cash received by farmers at $4,377,207,000 in 1932; $5,409,103,000 in 1933; $6,255,709,000 in 1934 and an estimated $6,900,000,000 in 1935.

The ratio of prices farmers received to what they paid for things they bought was said to have risen from 55 in March, 1933, to 90 in December, 1935. The report contained a table purporting to show the cost of food at retail had not risen as much as other living costs or increased earnings.

Advocates 500,000 More Homes

The survey advised that more than 500,000 homes should be built annually for the next ten years, but cited the low income of those needing homes and difficulties in carrying out Federal participation government issues, increased from among the handicaps to attaining such a goal.

As a sign of improving business, the survey quoted from a report by the Securities Exchange Commission that new security issues, excluding $1,064,000,000 in 1933 to $3,526,000,000 during the first nine months of 1935.

The NRA, the survey maintained, provided a million jobs by shortening the work week alone. "It is important to point out that significant upturns in industrial activity and employment and payrolls have occurred since March, 1933," was one of the statements.

Bachelors Jailed As Girls Run City

Leap Year Regime At Aurora, Ill., Seizes 100 Who Pay In Candy And Stockings

Bachelors went into hiding in Aurora, Ill., on February 29 as unmarried girls took over the executive jobs of the city for Leap Year Day.

With girls from 18 to 23 in charge of every city office from the Mayor's down to the dog catcher's, the city was dominated by "powder puff rule," according to the New York Times.

The girl officers, chosen by popular vote, held a council meeting, arrested more than 100 bachelors on sight, actually aided the fire department in fighting a fire and were the guests of city aldermen at a banquet tonight.

At the Council meeting, called by Miss Margaret Esser, a 24-year-old high school teacher acting as Mayor, the feminine council declared an open season on bachelors, listing them as public enemies. "Public enemy No.1 was Dr. John C. Murphy, 52.

The age limit on bachelors ranged from 21 up. As a result of their legislation bachelors were ordered to pay fines from $1 to $5 for using the term single blessedness, pay a "single tax" of 5 per cent on all Tom and Jerrys, chewing tobacco, manicures, shaves and haircuts. Bachelors were declared a menace to society.

Fines Paid in Candy

Chief of Police Helen Thompson, 23 years old, sent her man hunters out for bachelors immediately following the council meeting and the 100-odd caught were put behind bars in the City Hall.

They remained in jail until they came to trial before Miss Jean Harrison, city judge. Many paid their fines with boxes of candy and articles of clothing.

Frank R. Reid Jr., son of Representative in Congress Frank R Reid, chairman of the Mississippi Flood Control Commission, remained in jail four hours because he would not propose to Miss Dorothy Ward, the city jailer.

Arraigned before the court, Mr. Reid was instructed to say, "I love you, Dorothy. Will you please marry me?"

Four times in the four hours he was haled into court, and each time remained adamant, and each time "police" took him back. He finally was set free for five pounds of candy.

Miss Ward received one proposal, but the shock was too great for her to say "yes." After a minute's silence she said:

"Free the man; he has an honest heart."

Editor's Bail Is Silk Stockings

Included among those arrested was Albert M. Hirsh, 68, president and publisher of The Aurora Beacon News. His bail was silk stockings for all officers.

Clarence Ruddy, Assistant Attorney General of Illinois, questioned the validity of the order for his arrest. He thought it over inside of the jail.

Waiting to have their pictures taken by newsreel companies, Miss Rosalie Smith, 21, fire chief, and twenty of her assistant firemen aided in putting out a real fire.

Just as the camera men were about to take shots an alarm was received. The girls pleaded to go, but were told to stay home.

After the companies were all out they took possession of an old truck kept only for emergency and drove to the fire; they wiped the firemen's boots clean so they couldn't track up the house.

It rather spoiled them for pictures as their eyes watered and turned red from the smoke.

Training Courses, Work Camps Help Jobless Dutch Youth

Enforced idleness for 160,000 juvenile unemployed in the Netherlands is being turned into opportunity for education and professional training through a gradually developed system of training courses and work camps.

Meanwhile a new plan is being designed to make room for juvenile unemployed in the actual professions and industries, according to the Christian Science Monitor's correspondent at Amsterdam.

The main idea of this plan is that in many trades and businesses some work is left undone because it cannot be paid for. This is both administrative work and manual labor. All over the country there are now being founded local committees. These committees are to organize the execution of this sort of temporary work by juvenile unemployed. In addition to this work, training or education is also to be given.

Method of Financing

The firm with whom one or more juvenile unemployed are to work, will pay a certain small sum to the local committee. Only a certain percentage of the regular wages for such work is to be paid. Part of this sum is to be given by the committee to the juvenile worker as pocket money, while the rest is to be used for tuition. In this way the new plan will lay no additional financial burden on the shoulders of the Government.

For unemployed girls courses are being held in 22 localities to give them a thorough household training. It is hoped in this way to make the girls leave the factories and take up household work. This would make room for boys in the industries, while Netherlands housewives would be able to get Netherlands girl servants. In 1930 there were 80,000 German and Austrian servant girls employed in the Netherlands, while in 1935 this figure had risen to 40,000.

National Boards' Week

Youth itself had already shown initiative in combating idleness. Juvenile organizations some years ago started educational work among unemployed. A National Board for the Combating of Juvenile Unemployment was set up. The Government granted it subsidies. In 1935 there were 153 municipalities having such courses, with a Government subsidy of 400,000 florins ($275,000). In another 220 towns and villages similar courses are now being prepared.

These courses not only include training for manual labor like carpentering, wood working, metal working, painting, architectural drawing, mechanical drawing, weaving, gardening, agriculture, horticulture, etc., but also foreign languages (French, German, English, Esperanto) bookkeeping and general education through lectures, films, art lectures and music.

Central Workshops

An now in addition, in 70 localities juveniles are working on projects which otherwise would have been left undone because of lack of funds. They lay out sport grounds, swimming pools, they build youth hostels, open-air theaters. In several communities central workshops have been set up where boys can be trained professionally just like in a factory or big industrial workshop.

Apart from this, unemployed juveniles are sent to camps organized by some 30 juvenile organizations. In these camps they both work and receive instruction and training.

British Announce Big Scheme For Empire

making the new British defense policy imperative.

Industry to Be Geared Up

In her industrial program, which is indispensable for rearming on such a scale, Britain will have manufacturing plants throughout the country capable of producing both munitions and non-war materials, but all the plantts will be easily and quickly convertible to exclusive war uses. However, the government intends to avoid Germany's mistake of carrying the process so far as to impede normal trade and manufacturing while peace continues.

The White Paper is explicit on that point and in indicating that there will be no attempt to conscript either employers or labor for munitions work, dependence is to be placed on the voluntary cooperation of capital and labor, with precautions against graft and profiteering. It is hoped in London that Berlin will be as much impressed by the British production plan as by statistics of the air-force increases, with the result that Hitler will be convinced that any aggression must fail.

Many Laborites Resentful

Many Labor Opposition members who had indicated they would support any government arms plan consistent with Britain's League obligations openly condemn the program. They view it as evidence of sheer militarism that is wholly unjustified by the international situation and entirely irrelevant to this country's League obligations. Their point is that military support of the League to check aggression should take the form of concerted action by League powers and that provisions for it should be made under League supervision, not by each country building to suit itself. The government's reply to that would be that Britain will never have her military policy determined for her by Geneva, even though that policy is in large part to support Geneva.

There will be formal debate on the White Paper in the House of Commons next Monday and Tuesday, but already there is ample preliminary comment in the parliamentary lobbies. The extreme Conservatives are disappointed because they do not think the program is large enough, and some of them object to the determination to build two more battleships. They think the millions of pounds thus involved could be better spent on additional bombing planes.

The outlook is that the Labor party will oppose the plan politically in Parliament but will not attempt to persuade the powerful trade-union wing of the party to put any obstacles in the way of munitions production. The workers, in view of the fact that rearmament will result in much employment, are expected to acquiesce if they are assured of retaining all their present union privileges and of not being conscripted for munitions jobs.

Germany Reverses Plan For 'Next War'

to be a fairly definite decision to confine the war in the east if and when it comes—to one largely of defensive operations.

First among the military reasons—the drive carried out under a modified Schlieffen plan, as well as all subsequent drives on the western front during the war, failed of the ultimate object to crush France.

Second, France has taken steps to extend to the sea the chain of fortresses which in 1914 defended only the eastern portion of the French frontier. It may be argued that if the Schlieffen plan had been executed properly in 1914 France would have been crushed. Yet it would not follow that a future war might provide an opportunity for a more perfect execution. The fact is that France, in extending the line of fortresses to the sea, has removed one of the principal factors on which the plan was based.

Count Alfred von Schlieffen, who perfected his plan in 1905, a year before he retired as chief of the general staff, saw that the way into France led to the westward and through Belgium, a clean sweep around the fortifications of the eastern frontier. He called for a concentration of force on the right wing. The great machine was to swing into France through Belgium, pivoting on the fortress of Metz—"the swing-door plan," as it often was referred to. The left flank was to be left relatively weak and there was to be a temporary withdrawal in Alsace to a line between Strasbourg and Metz.

He Feared Error

Schlieffen's haunting fear was that at the crisis a man unequal to the task would be in the position which he himself had filled with such distinction, and his dying words are said to have been "Above all, keep the right wing strong." As it turned out, his fears were realized posthumously within a little more than a year.

It is probable that were Werner von Fritsch, the present chief of the general staff, instructed to prepare for the future invasion of France he would reply.. 'he invasion of a character calculated to bring substantial results would be next to impossible. The French fortifications are too strong."

What are the implications of the apparent German decision for defensive strategy in the west? In the first place, this decision is calculated to intensify the desire of the army to rearm the demilitarized Rhine zone and construct fortifications along the frontier. The stronger the fortifications in that quarter, the smaller the number of troops that would be required on the western front in wartime, and it follows, of course, that the smaller the army in the west, the larger the possible concentration of force in the east.

Assuming the war is on two fronts, the general staff probably will plan for swift crushing blows at the start in the southeast. Austria and the Panhandle of Czechoslovakia between Bavaria and Silesia would be in German hands within a few days, before substantial Soviet aid can arrive. Memel may be taken meanwhile by the army in east Prussia.

Thus all indications point to an inverse and greatly modified Schlieffen plan in so far as the first stages of war are concerned; in the east a swift offense, in the west defense. It is hardly necessary to point out that the Germans would prefer to have war on a single front, but they fear that conflict in central Europe will involve France because of the latter's interests and commitments in that quarter.

Reich Army To Eat Fish To Aid Nation

Police Also To Give Up Meat Two Days A Week Because Of Food Shortage

The German Army and police have been put on a fish diet two days weekly to relieve the food shortage which has already led to drastic rationing and cattle and pig slaughter but is still draining the Reichsbank's slender reserve for necessary fats and feeds.

The order to the army was issued by General Werner von Blomberg, War Minister, and will be effective till the end of April, says a dispatch to the New York Times from Berlin dated March 3. The article continues:

The instructions to the police, issued by Dr. Wilhelm Frick, Interior Minister, provide for one compulsory fish day weekly and "recommend" a second warm fish meal weekly.

In addition the Reich Nutrition Estate is agitating for a second fish day besides Friday everywhere and the Winter Relief Organization has included a fish dish as one of the three one-dish meals to be served next Sunday, the last of the one-dish Sundays this year.

Fishing to Be Increased

According to official figures the meat supply dropped 15.3 per cent during January compared with December and 7.1 per cent compared with January of last year. To ease the situation the government imports frozen meat from Argentina and whale oil from Norway, facilitates the sending of "gift packages" from other countries and seeks to popularize products of the ocean which are to be exploited more as a free raw material source through enlarged German fishing fleets and a new whaling fleet.

Spring is an especially favorable fishing season and the army and police as well as the population's patriotism have been enlisted to help take care of the catch and avoid waste.

The avoidance of waste is important because according to final estimates the harvest of bread grains last year was even lower than the admittedly poor yield of the preceding year and lower than the six-year average despite the agricultural "production battle."

The Reichsbank report, issued today, shows that last week another 1,900,000 marks worth of gold was used for food and food purchases abroad, bringing the total amount of gold so used to approximately 10,000,000 marks within a short time, reducing the Reichsbank's declared gold reserve to 71,700,000 marks.

These losses, however, are announced largely for propaganda and the declared gold reserve is only technically accurate. It does not take into account the gold reserves of the State banks, now controlled by the Reichsbank, or the fact that since July, 1934, Germany imported more than 162,000,000 marks worth more of gold than she exported.

Twenty-five more German intellectuals, led by Arnold Zweig, noted author, were denationalized today by order of Dr. Frick in agreement with Baron Constantin von Neurath, Foreign Minister, on the ground that they had "violated their duty of loyalty to the Reich and to the people and had damaged German interests."

In the list are authors, journalists, parliamentarians, theater directors, actors, lawyers, government officials and one former official of the National Socialist Labor Front who fled with money belonging to a labor relief lottery. Nine are designated as Jews, most of the others as Communists, Socialists and other Leftists. All apparently are exiles.

One is Herbert Stahl, who writes under the name of Steel, who is denounced as "a Jewish editor who directed lying press attacks in American newspapers against Germany and in connection with the Jewish boycott movements surpassed all other machinations of that kind in meanness."

Japanese Family System Lauded By Editor of Atlantic Monthly

In Japan the family foundation is sacred—may it continue deep and fine, he continued. He declared that collective family responsibility has saved Japan the desperate unemployment problem with which the United States is still grappling.

Other speakers were Mr. Robert (Bob) Davis of the New York Sun, Mr. John Weddell, prominent member of the Japan Society of Chicago, and Mr. Wilder Hobson of Fortune Magazine. 'Next-to-Nothing' Home Feature Of Exhibition give many persons the opportunity of seeing the everyday quarters of many others.

Unusual Choices

The "many others" in this case include a lighthouse keeper, and Oxford undergraduate, a Benedictine monk, a member of the crew of a trawler, the personnel of a submarine, and an art student.

Each year the exhibition contains a show of gardens, intended as a foretaste to spring and summer, an inspiration to gardeners and a rest to visitors. This year the gardens have been designed under the inspiration of music.

They are called "The Gardens of the Musicians." Each one is a gardener's interpretation of some famous passage of music. They range a scale from Frederick Delius to George Gershwin. The gardeners claim to have conquered the difficult task of making a restful garden from the inspiration of syncopation, although it is not yet revealed how they have achieved this paradoxical effect.

A Bit of Gretna Green

Since most new homes are the immediate outcome of new marriages, the exhibition is to show a reproduction of the blacksmith's shop at Gretna Green, Scotland. This shop has been one of the goals of romantic English couples for many centuries, including those who have eloped to take speedy advantage of the easier marriage laws of Scotland. In the past seven years over 200 marriages have been solemnized over the blacksmith's anvil at Gretna Green.

Mr. G. B. Mackie, Laird of Gretna, has given assistance in producing this exhibit and has agreed to lend a large number of the original relics pertaining to the forge. The actual anvil, over which marriages are still performed, will be among these.

The housing section of the show will, it is claimed, disclose the latest developments in planning, equipment and furnishing of modern houses. It will include six houses, ranging in price from £775 to £2500, and a block of modern apartment flats at a wide variety of rentals.

3rd Engineering Congress Covers Six-Day Period

Foreign Delegates Attend Meeting Held In Capital During Past Week

The Third Engineering Congress held at Tokyo Imperial University since April 1 closed on Monday. A number of foreign engineers, here as delegates, attended the congress. They gave several illustrated lectures at the conference. Lectures were held during all six days of the conference at the Lecture Hall of the university. An exhibition of Japanese mechanical industries was also hold at the university from last April 4 to 6.

Dr. Bunji Mano, president of the Japanese Engineering Society held a dinner in honor of the delegates and the members of the society on the occasion of the Third Congress at the Seiyoken Restaurant, Uyeno Park, Tokyo on Saturday evening. Dr. Mano's welcome spech was as follows:

Guests Welcomed

"It is my pleasant duty this evening to greet you, participants in our Third Engineering Congress, and to extend a cordial welcome to the delegates, guests and members from China, Siam, the Dutch East Indies, Iran, and Manchoukuo who have come all the way from their respective countries to attend the congress.

"We are deeply appreciative of your presence and active participation and congratulate ourselves with you on the splendid success of our joint endeavours at this Congress.

"We are particularly happy that our Third Engineering Congress has succeeded so eminently as an international undertaking, and for this fact, we must express our grateful thanks to out foreign colleagues here present tonight.

"We all recall with great satisfaction the brilliant achievements, from the point of view of international fellowship in Engineering, of the World Engineering Congress held in Tokyo in 1929.

"Similar results, though necessarily in a smaller geographical scale, have been attained, I believe, by the present Congress and it is our sincere hope that we have been able to bring closer together the nations in this part of the world and build their friendship in a solid foundation, for in science, it is not isolation but cooperation, not a narrow nationalism but a generous internationalism, that is vitally needed to make it truly efficient and fruitful.

Objection of Invitation

"Our object in inviting you to this Congress has been, of course, primarily scientific and professional, so that we may compare one author's notes and facilitate our works together for the common cause. But we have also desired to enjoy our social contact in this ideal cherry blossom season of Japan. Here Nature herself appears to be a unique and superb Engineer having to her credit Mount Fuji, the Island Sea, hills and waterfalls everywhere, and the cherry blossoms which, by the way, are rather unusually late in coming out this year and I suppose; in honor of the Third Congress and its welcome guests from abroad.

"We hope and trust that after your strenous professional efforts you will do full justice to the hospitality which both Nature and Man are ready to offer you all over the country and that you will gather as full and accurate a knowledge of Japan, not only in our industrial and technical aspects, but as a nation with high aspirations and goodwill towards the rest of the World.

"In closing, we thank you once more for your attendance and cooperation to which is no doubt due the great success of the Third Engineering Congress in Tokyo."

All the delegates who assisted at the congress will proceed to the Imperial Gardens at Shinjuku on Tuesday to view its beauty. A welcome party in honor of the foreign delegates will be held at the Koyokan Restaurant, Shiba, that evening. They will also make a trip to Hakone.

During the session of the Congress, all the members inspected several Japanese factories and institutions.

Jews' Plight Laid To Trade Crises

A.A. Troyanovsky Says The Rulers Of Europe Try To Conceal Their Failures

The anti-semitism in some countries of Europe is due to the efforts of the ruling groups to conceal from the masses their failure to cope with critical economic conditions, Alexander A. Troyanovsky, Soviet Ambassador to the United States, said in New York City on March 11.

Recalling that racial persecution was marked in the Middle Ages, the Ambassador said that "to our great regret we have to note that in some respects present-day European civilization has not advanced far from medievalism, according to the New York Times.

He spoke at a dinner given in his honor at the Hotel Astor by the American Committee for the Settlement of Jews in Birobidjan. The dinner also marked the opening of a campaign to raise $350,000 to be used for the settlement of European Jewish exiles in the Jewish territory in the Soviet Union.

Cites Middle Ages

"The Jewish people and particularly their poverty have often been used as the scapegoat for turning the attention of the suffering masses from the real causes of misfortune and hardships," the Ambassador said. "The Middle Ages are notorious for varied explosions of anti-semitism, always to cover up the many political diseases of that time.

"Economic crises of the second half of the last century brought explosions of anti-semitism in various countries. Europe since the great war has been gripped by acute economic crises, and new outbursts of anti-semitism have horrified civilized people of all countries. Reaction and anti-semitism tend to become synonymous where the Jews form a noticeable part of the population."

himself by anti-semitic words and deeds."

No Bias in Soviet Union

There is no Jewish problem in the Soviet Union, he said, adding that "we are happy that anti-semitism has almost completely disappeared in our country, and our young generation especially is completely free from any trace of the anti-semitic spirit."

All the various races in Soviet Russia are striving to make the Jewish province of Birobodjan a success, he said. At the present time the population of the province is 50,000, including 15,000 Jews.

The plan for 1936 anticipates the settlement of 1,000 families and 500 single persons from outside Soviet Russia. The government reserves the right to select the immigrants "on the ability of the applicant to stand life under pioneering conditions," he said. The $200 which the immigrants must pay the Soviet Government for expenses in getting to the province and settling there will not cover the cost to the government, he said.

Other speakers were United States Senator Elbert D. Thomas of Utah, William W. Cohen, president of the committee; Dr. Jacob Billikopf of Philadelphia, Supreme Court Justice Mitchell May and James Waterman Wise.

"Japan is really the land about which I have dreamed since my childhood," Prof. Wilhelm Kempff, noted German musician, told friends Tuesday afternoon at a musicale which he gave under the patronage of the German Ambassador and Mrs.

Mr. Wilhelm Kempff

von Dirksen at the German Embassy. Prof. Kempff arrived in Tokyo April 1 for a series of concerts.

"Japan still preserves the old traditions and in this she has a link with Germany. It is because of the love of old and proven culture that I have decided to play classical German compositions in my recitals here," he said. Prof. Kempff is a pianist. His concert at the embassy, characterized by the fullness of expression and exactitude, included: Fuga by Bach, a sonata by Mozart, Sonata No. 109 by Beethoven, and polonaise by Chopin.

Several hundred seasons were present, including a number of prominent citizens and leading musicians. Among them were members of Diplomatic corps of Tokyo and Yokohama, Marquis et Marchioness Toshitame Maeda, the Minister of the Imperial Household Department and Mrs. Tsuneo Matsudaira, Viscount Hidemaro Konoye, Dr. Tatsukichi Irisawa, Marquis and Marchioness Yorisada Tokugawa, Mr. Ichiro Hatoyama and many others.

Mr. Wilhelm Kempff was born in a musical family in Juterbog, Germany on November 25, 1895. His grandfather was organist. His father is a conductor of an orchestra at Postdam at present, yet he is also a well known organist and choir conductor.

Mr. Kempff started to study musical composition at the age of 5 and showed unusual talent in music by the time he was 9 years old. He studied musical composition under Prof. Kahn at the Berlin University and piano under Prof. Heinrich Balt. In 1914, he was graduated from Victoria College. He was awarded the Mendelsoohn's Memorial Prize for his musical composition and piano playing when he was graduated at the Higher Musical School of Berlin at 1917.

Italians Face Lengthy List Of New Taxes

Special Capital Levy Now Looms To Meet Costs Of Continuing War

Italians are speculating about new taxes which it is recognizid will be necessary to meet the heavy expenditure of the war in Ethiopia and the upkeep of a large army at home according to the Rome correspondent of the Christian Science Monitor.

It is estimated that by May next the Italian Government will have spent something like 10,000,000,000 lire, or more than $80,000,000 at current rates, on the Ethiopian War and its preparation. For some time rumors have been in circulation that the Government is contemplating a new capital levy.

New Capital Levy

It is believed that a new capital levy would provide for the payment of 10 per cent of cash holdings of the value of bonds and shares and of the estimated value of furniture and other goods. The estimation of values would be made by the fiscal authorities and special inspectors would be entrusted to make the necessary enquiries.

The Italian people are already very heavily taxed and the new capital levy certainly would not be a popular measure. It may be taken for granted, however, that the people would accept it with discipline and in that spirit of self-sacrifice of which they have given, especially in recent times, manifold proofs.

25 Different Taxes

The trouble with Italian taxation is not with the rates imposed as much as with the extraordinarily large number of taxes in operation in this country. Here is a list of the most generally applied taxes;

1. Land.
2. Supplementary land tax.
3. Agrarian contribution.
4. Vineyards.
5. Buildings.
6. Suppelementary on buildings.
7. Contribution to Fascist Syndicates.
8. Sojourn tax (this applies to all persons, Italian or foreign, not born in the commune and not exempted under some other heading).
9. Government income tax.
10. Supplementary government income tax.
11. Communal income tax.
12. Provincial income tax.
13. Complementary income tax.
14. Chamber of Commerce.
15. Patrimonial.
16. Bachelors.
17. Tenancy.
18. Pianofortes.
19. Billiards.
20. Certificates (driving and teaching licenses, professional degrees, etc.).
21. Licenses to sell or practice.
22. Cattle and horses.
23. Dogs.
24. Maids and servants.
25. Signboards.

And, in Addition

In addition to these there are taxes on automobiles and bicycles, machinery of all kinds, on radios, on coffee-machines, cigarette lighters and playing cards. Besides these charges there are government taxes on electric lights, gas, water and telephone.

Finally, there are taxes paid to the provinces and communes.

The lot of the Italian taxpayer is not a happy one.

States' Rights Issue Pressed In Australia

Results Of 34 Years Of Federation Come Under Widespread Criticism

Diminishing faith in the working of the Australian Constitution, which forms the foundation of the federation, had led every state into a critical attitude toward the Commonwealth Government, says the Melbourne correspondent of the Christian Science Monitor.

Efforts are being made to arrange a conference of state premiers in Hobart, Tas., and, if it is held, it is fairly certain that an attempt will be made to strike an effective blow at the authority of the central administration. This is unquestionably the most vital political question in Australia at the moment.

After 34 years of federation, the states, without exception, are convinced that it has not been all that everyone hoped it would be. They watch the Commonwealth taking more power unto itself at their expense; and they are pained to see federal revenues soar to produce surpluses, while their own languish and leave them with deficits.

Cling to Sovereignty

Moreover, the states see their greatly cherished sovereignty being intruded upon and are unable to lift a finger to stem the giant of their own making in what they fear is a march across their borders which will end in the ultimate and complete "annexation" of the states by their lusty offspring.

Thirty-four years ago the six independent colonies of Australia agreed to federate. They believed it would simplify affairs immensely. On the contrary, the Constitution has almost ever since been a happy hunting ground for lawyers and a battle ground for every one of the Parliaments. Western Australia's recent strenuous efforts to secede and revert to complete autonomy was one striking indication of the way the interpretation of the Constitution has annoyed the smaller states.

Asked Right to Secede

Western Australia was in deadly earnest, and it was not her fault that she could not coerce the British Parliament to let her have her freedom. However, although the Australian Constitution is also embodied in an Act of the British Parliament, the Home Government rightly followed constitutional convention and said that it would not think of altering that act unless it could be assured that a majority of the people of Australia wished it to do so.

This being so, the Australian people must find a remedy for themselves, and unless Government spokesmen in different states are to be disbelieved, they will have to unravel a tangled situation or be driven to do so by force of circumstances.

Exercise of Authority

One thing seems to be certain. The Federal Administration will not surrender any of its powers lightly. Indeed, it says that there is no complaint about the extension of its powers, but merely about the exercise of its legitimate authority.

But under federation the States are suffering from disabilities which few, if any, of the farmers of the Constitution foresaw or dreamed would ever be possible.

To put it mildly, the financial relations between the states and the Commonwealth are strained. Again, if responsible premiers and their ministers are to be believed—and impartial observers do not doubt them—relations are strained almost to breaking point.

Indeed, the Tasmanian Economic Case Committee, which has the full blessing of the Government, recently went as far as to say that unless disabilities were righted, the ultimate disintegration of federation would be inevitable. And Tasmania is not alone in expressing such fears.

Victoria Disgruntled

Victoria, the second most important state, is almost as disgruntled as the smaller states which are suffering most, and her Premier Albert A. Dunstan, was sarcastic about the trend of federal administration when the Loan Council recently declined to let him have all the money he wanted for his year's program.

Much of the growing dissatisfaction in every state is caused by the commonwealth's deepening pocket, and the diminishing financial powers of the states. It was provided by the Constitution of 1901 that for 10 years the commonwealth should have one quarter of customs and excise revenue (the right to collect which was abandoned by the states).

Three quarters was to be divided among the states. In 1909 it was agreed that the commonwealth should pay annually to the states sums equal to 25 shillings a head of their population.

Reduction in Revenue

This reduced the proportion of revenue returned to the states to one half; it made no allowance for increases in commonwealth revenue being disproportionate to increases of population; it made no allowance for possible variations in the value of money; it deprived the states of money needed for essential social services to enable the commonwealth to pay for a secondary service (old age pensions) for which it had assumed responsibility. Under this new plan the states received only £5,600,000 as compared with £8,000,000 in 1909-10.

Then come the famous Financial Agreement in 1927, proposed by the Commonwealth and accepted by all the states to replace the previous arrangement. Around this agreement there now rages the central controversy concerning the financial disabilities of the states.

The Commonwealth agreed to take over the states' public debts totaling £672,120,000 as well as other state commitments, and to contribute £7,585,000 a year for 58 years toward interest charges. Chief among other provisions was the formation of the Loan Council, representative of the state and Commonwealth governments, which would control all borrowing by the seven governments.

Directed by Mrs. V. H. Blaxill the senior pupils of the Windsor House School presented magnificent rendering of Shakespeare's "Julius Caesar" to an appreciative audience at the K.R. and A.C. gymnasium on Wednesday evening. The audience were greatly impressed to note that a Japanese young lady, Miss Sakiko Kishimoto, took the part of Lucius and also of Strato. Lucius and Strato, it will be remembered, were servants of Brutus and therefore were people of some importance in the play. Miss Kishimoto has a very remarkable command of English and her lines were heard clearly. It is very difficult to say who were the finest actors and actresses in the performance but Miss Anne Hondelink as Julius Caesar, Miss Nellie Shroff as Brutus, Miss Mary Shroff as Marcus Antonius and Miss Barbara King as Cassius deserve especial mention as portrayers of character.

World Events Influence New Dress Fashions

Tobe Finds Drastic Change In Styles At Openings Abroad; Men Copy Eden

World affairs, social and political, are influencing fashions this spring far more than ever before, according to Tobe, fashion authority and consultant to more than a hundred stores throughout the United States, who returned to the country recently from Paris and London.

The influence of world events, politics, war, expositions, the theater and of world personalities, particularly Anthony Eden, "England's man of the hour," is evidenced, she said, in numerous spring fashion trends found in the Paris openings and in the London fashion picture, according to the New York Herald Tribune.

Tobe listed four examples of how the influences she described were affecting fashions. They follow:

1. The current hit of the Paris Theater has inspired the very feminine "Margot" fashions.

. Anthony Eden has influenced men's fashions.

3. The great London Chinese exhibit has definitely stamped Chinese colors and designs into the fashion picture.

4. British mourning is responsible for the tremendous spurt in the wearing of gray and violet shades as well as the traditional black.

American Spring Fashions

In surveying the American spring fashion picture, Tobe listed the following general characteristics:

"Skirts will be ten to twelve inches from the ground, but pleated skirts must be really short, as shown by Rochas and Mainbocher. Skirts will also have easy fullness and pleats will be popular.

"Shoulders are generally broad, though some classic shoulders persist.

"Sleeves have interest but are not too exaggerated. The Vionnet sleeve will live through the summer, because it is not fattening, but continues breadth. Many short sleeves will be seen, even for early spring.

'Waistlines continue normal for daytime. The low waist of Molyneux and the directoire waistline of Schiaparelli are still too extreme, but prophetic of the future. There is a tendency toward basque bodices both for day and evening, influenced by the play 'Margot.'

"Necklines vary. Many are still high, but usually not over the collarbone in front. A tendency toward lower necklines is expressed in one or two dresses in each of the Paris collections. The new Vinonnet neckline is lower.

Fabrics and Colors

"Shantung was shown everywhere at the openings for sports wear. Colorful, topical prints were outstanding—as pig, rabbit, chicken or leaf or petal designs. Diagonals and plaids retain their popularity. Molyneux showed a large white tulip design which promises to be important.

"Because of the English court mourning there was much more black than usual, but navy blue is the classic color, often with violet accents. Among the brighter accent colors Chinese jade and coral figure prominently. Gray and cinnamon crop up frequently in woolens.

Spring Suits

"There were many suit dresses and tailored silk suits at the Paris openings. However, the wool suit was the biggest Paris fashion. Suit types include finger-tip swagger suits; 'the short, hip-length fitted-back jacket, Tyrolean-inspired, shown by both Schiaparelli and Maiyneux; Channel's boyish box suit, a good April suit fashion; tunic suits, one of the smartest of tailored types; classic tailleurs identical to our American tailored suits, and many cape ensembles, always with broad shoulders.

"Suit colors shown in the openings include lots of black and navy blue, also the spice shades, and some gray everywhere.

"Suit fabrics were semi-rough casual or hairy woolens, or Shetland tweeds, which composed the entire Schiaparelli collection. However, the men's wear fabrics are carrying on in volume in America.

"Broad shoulders are feature of all coats. Swagger coats are still outstanding in all fabrics, and there are many variations of the reefer in the softer fabrics.

Evening Fashions

"Evening fashions fall into three clasifications. First, dinner suits with broad shouldered capes or packets or swagger coats; second, formal evening gowns with very full skirts in many variations, among them stiffened hemlines; third, classic evening gowns with easy, but slim skirts. The law, formal decolletage is universal.

"Evening fabrics in the full-skirted silhouette are stiff taffetas, plain or patterned; also plain and printed organzas and chiffons. Classic evening fashions are in heavy sheers, prints, white satin. Printed challis is a smart novelty.

"Evening colors include much black and white, often with a color contrast such as violet or jade. Also the violet tones ranging to fuschia, and Vionnet shows the Chinese colors Mandarin red and jade.

"Evening wraps include may capes of all lengths, usually with broad shoulders. Finger-tip swagger wraps also continue important."

When only 7 years old, Lupe Zarate of McAllen, Texas, fell beneath a train and both his arms were severed at the shoulders. Despite his great handicap, Lupe has outshone his more fortunate fellowmen in swmming, wrestling, and football. Three times while swimming in the great irrigation canal near his home, Lupe has saved as many of his pals by grabbing their bathing suits with his teeth and pulling them to shore. But the most outstanding of his rescues was in West Springfield, Mass., in July 1934. He was with a crowd of swimmers near the Agawam River, when he heard a cry for help. Plunging in the water, he quickly reached the drowning youth, who grabbed Lupe in a choke hold and pulled both of them down. Then Lupe broke away and as they came to the surface, he was able to get the exhausted boy across the shoulders and bring him ashore.

To Cross Greenland

Domei

PARIS—Three young Frenchmen will set out at the end of March to cross the Greenland Ice Cap from west to east, announces the "Paris Soir."

The three men, Paul-Emile Victor (ethnographer), Dr. Robert Gessain (anthropologist), and Michel Perez (geologist) were all members of the 1934-35 expedition.

They will make a trek across Greenland from the west coast by sleigh to Angmagssalik. They expect this journey to take over two months; the distance is about 600 miles over uninhabited mountains from 6,000 to 9,000 feet high.

They are taking with them equipment for fighting influenza which is reported to be prevalent among the Eskimoes this year.

FOLK DANCE PROGRAM

A folk dance program of professional excellence was given by amateurs from the country districts before several thousand Tokyo residents packing the Nippon Seinenkan Friday evening. The program is an annual event, given under the auspices of the Federation of Young Men's Associations to encourage and preserve the traidtional arts characteristic of rural communities of Japan. It is presented in April, a time of leisure in the country. The amateurs come from the prefectures to give the dances just as they are given in the rural districts.

One of the most impressive numbers in Friday evening's program was the Ennen no Mai, a dance originating in Hiraizumi-mura, a village of Iwate prefecture which was the center of culture and political intrigue during the latter part of the 12th century. The dance suggested the rich temple life of the community and gave a glimpse of the origin of the No and of the Kabuki.

In sharp contrast to the stately and slow motions of the Ennen no Mai was the Numakuma Odori, danced by young men from Numakuma-gun in Hiroshima prefecture. Clad in black and white robes, straw sandals and wearing white bands around their heads, they circled in a spirited and imaginary procession to the temple, beating large drums and metal gongs. The dance originated as residents of Numakuga-gun in ancient times journeyed to temples and shrines to ask the gods to give rain and to ward off injurious insects from their crops.

A motion picture showed numerous old dances of Japan, among them several which were danced on the stage at the Nippon Seisenkan last April.

The program also included Miyake-jima songs and dances, the Tsuahima Odori, the Yagae-Bushi, and the Oboshi Ondo.

Capacity Output Urged By Labor

limits the market for industry's product and must, if not corrected, cut down production and prepare the way for another depression.

Relief 'a Mere Pittance'

"The Federation Survey of Business last month showed one reason for the fact that, when the prot motive operates without control, business depressions cannot be avoided. This second reason, the shortage of workers' buying power, is equally basic.

"It is an inevitable but none-theless tragic fact that industry, as it recovers, is failing to solve the problem of unemployment because it has turned its back on a basic New Deal principle. According to Standard Statistics, industrial production in March will probably reach a new high point for the depression. The prospective index for the first quarter of 1936 shows that production has reached a level more than half way back to 1929, but we still have 16,500,000 on WPA or relief, three-quarters of our peak relief roll.

"Although production last year was 14 per cent above 1934, relief rolls reached a higher average level than ever before. It cost our government, national and local, $2,000,000,000 to keep nearly 18,000,000 persons (average) on relief last year, not counting those working under PWA. This year, it is estimated, another $2,000,000,000 will be needed.

"These huge sums can furnish a mere pittance to those who have lost all resources. Great suffering in many localities has followed the withdrawal of Federal funds when more than 1,000,000 families were transferred to State and local relief. The American Association of Social workers report that self-respecting workers denied the chance to earn their bread, are receiving 'lowgrade pauper treatment' over wide areas of the country, and that vast numbers are reduced to a desperate condition.
